HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

There are certain areas within the Castle of the Mad Archmage for which verbal description alone might be insufficient to convey the full tone, and for which an illustration is more likely to impart the “feel” of a place or object. Too, sometimes drawing attention to a particular detail in a verbal description might alert players to the fact that something is amiss, whereas burying such detail in an illustration can ensure that only alert players are rewarded.

Certain areas and encounters detailed in the Castle of the Mad Archmage Adventure Book will instruct the game master to show the players a numbered illustration. These numbers correspond to the numbered illustrations in this book. No more detailed label (either referring to the subject matter or even the location of the encounter within the dungeons) is given, lest it betray information to the players that they might not otherwise have.

For areas that are seen, show the appropriate illustration for as long as they care to view it, noting carefully how long they linger taking in the vista, and count such time as being spent in the dungeon itself. For objects such as maps, allow the players to refer to them at will, as long as they have the physical object with their characters. Otherwise they must rely on memory.
