

💡 The Genius Guide to:

APPRENTICE-LEVEL CHARACTERS

PATHFINDER
ROLEPLAYING GAME COMPATIBLE

When you consider the number of things a 1st-level character can do in a Pathfinder RPG campaign, it's pretty clear that even the lowest level characters have completed some intense training. But what do you do if you want to start an adventure before your wizards have mastered their 1st-level spells and paladins have discovered how to detect evil at will? The Genius Guide to Apprentice-Level Characters presents simple rules for creating 0-level or 1/2 level characters who have some instruction but aren't yet fully trained members of their class.

APPRENTICE-LEVEL CHARACTERS

There are two typical ways to use apprentice-level characters. The first is to run a campaign where the characters start at level 0. Such characters begin with half the starting gold they'd normally get at 1st-level and usually represent characters that are still in training. If you want to begin a game at a training facility or in a village that is normally guarded by 1st-level warriors, having 0-level player characters would be appropriate. It takes 1/2 as many experience points to go from 0 to 1st level as it takes to go from 1st to 2nd level.

The other use of apprentice-level characters is to allow multiclass characters at 1st level. An apprentice-fighter/apprentice rogue is (roughly) the same as a 1st-level character, and allows the character to begin play with a mix of stealth and martial skill. When such a multiclass character reaches 2nd level, he becomes 1st level in both of the two classes, and proceeds normally from there.

While apprentice-level characters use the same basic rules for combat and actions as any Pathfinder character, there are a few specific questions that should be addressed in regards to these characters.

RACIAL ABILITIES

Apprentice-level characters receive all the racial abilities normal for their race.

HIT DICE

Apprentice-level characters get half a hit die, which often results in needing to roll a d5 or a d3. The easiest way to do this is roll a die twice the size required and halve all results (rounding up in the case of fractions), so a result of 1 or 2 reads as a 1, a result of 3 or 4 as 2, and so on. (Some companies even sell dice that only roll from 1–3 or 1–5, which can be a handy and fun addition to your dice bag.) Apprentice-level characters add only half their Constitution modifier to their 1/2 hit die. Round down in the case of fractions. (In most campaigns it's a good idea to give apprentice-level characters maximum hit points rather than forcing them to roll, but these rules work either way.)

SKILLS

Apprentice-level characters have the same class skill lists as 1st-level versions of the class. They have half the skill points of 1st-level characters, gain only a +1 bonus for putting a rank in a class skill, and only add half their Intelligence modifier to that total. Apprentice-level characters may put a maximum of one rank into a skill (and may not put another rank into the same skill until reaching 2nd level).

ARMOR/WEAPON PROFICIENCIES

Apprentice-level characters have the same armor and weapon proficiencies as 1st-level members of the class.

FEATS

Apprentice-level characters have not yet gained the feat all characters receive at 1st level. Instead, the GM may decide to give such characters a trait (see the Advanced Player's Guide for more information on traits). Apprentice-level characters do receive any feats gained because of their race.

SPECIAL ABILITIES

Even when an apprentice level character has special abilities listed, those abilities are usually not at full power. Unless otherwise stated, an apprentice-level character can use any ability that has a limited number of times per day half as often as a 1st-level character (minimum 1/day). If an ability grants a bonus, the apprentice-level character gets half the bonus (minimum 1). If an ability deals damage, it deals one die-step less damage. With those caveats, treat the character's level as if it was 1 for all level-dependent effects.

SPELLS

Most apprentice-level spellcasting classes gain access to their cantrips/orisons as if they were 1st-level characters. Some gain limited access to 1st-level spells, as well. If an apprentice-level character has 0 or more 1st-level spell slots, they gain additional spell slots from high ability scores normally. If the class only grants 1st-level spells in a limited set (such as the apprentice-cleric's one 1st-level domain slot), the character does not receive bonus spell slots from ability scores until reaching 1st level. Apprentice-level characters that are able to cast spells have a caster level of 1. An apprentice-level character does not receive any spellcasting ability unless the apprentice class description specifically mentions it.

GRADUATION

When characters "graduate" from apprentice level to 1st level, they get all the abilities and bonuses their apprentice level lacked. Thus they go to a full hit die, gain their full ability score modifiers, get +3 bonuses to class skills, their base attacks and saves go up to normal for 1st level, and so on. A multiclass apprentice/apprentice graduates on becoming a second level character, and gains the full benefit of being 1st level in two classes.
