In the Year of the Emperor 681 did the Huns of the Great Steppes enter into civil war amongst their own numberless clans.

Seven Legions had made fortified holds at the Dwarf Passes of the Stoneheart, one hold to a Legion, and did push the Huns back by use of Equestria and Phalanx in concert with the secret dwarf iron learned from the Hill Folk of Irkaina against the horse warriors of the plains. The Legions did make successful raids deep into the homeland of the Khan's people for the first time and deliver back blood for blood the wounds of Apothasalos and Occibolos and a thousand thousand raids on villages and farms. The Legions did show no mercy and iron pike and sword hewed warrior and herdsman, soldier and farmer alike. And such was the outcry among the Hun that many clans did pack their belongings upon their Yurt Houses and relocate to the farthest corners of the plains at the Nam-i-Budhani that are called Lost Mountains in the civilized tongue.

The laws of the savage held that none could step foot on the Lost Mountains or the shores of the dark lake at their feet, yet now many clans did settle there and make as if to live far from the Legions among ruins older than Boros. Then the Great Khan Ogedane did order the knights of his court to make war upon the clans that did break the taboo and spill their blood for the good of all lest the darkness return. And war did engulf the whole of the Hun people for two years until when next the Legions of made foray into the plains they found only scattered peoples remained who fled their sight as fast as they could. Dolemarck Corbillius did write then that the skulls of the Horse People did floor the plains so thick that his horse could walk from the mountains to the Great Sea and never touch earth.

Such was the fate of the Hun that forevermore should their empire of old be called the Haunted Steppe, fit for no man to live save the few Shattered Folk who still ride its cursed grasses.
