Literature, particularly fantasy, has always had a major influence on role-playing games. Tolkien's orcs, dwarves, elves, and dragons (or interpretations of them) have appeared in the pages of nearly every fantasy role-playing game, and the associated magazines have supplied a steady supplement of characters well-known to readers of Moorcock, Lieber, and Howard.

This is not surprising. Gamers are notoriously well-read, and more often than not the characters created by the fantasy authors display a degree of colorfulness and depth which cries out for reader-created adventures. The melding of these two areas of interest has been natural and inescapable. Much more noteworthy is the recent emergence of literature inspired by various fantasy role-playing games. Andre Norton's Quag Keep comes to mind immediately as an example. She captured on paper an exceptional FRP adventure and published it as a novel.

In this light, my shared-setting anthologies Thieves' World and Tales from the Vulgar Unicorn simply show another half-turn of whatever wheel it is that rolls back and forth between fantasy gaming and fantasy writing.

For the unaware, the anthologies I write of provide a town (specifically a backwater town named Sanctuary)—a town complete with a history, street maps, political situation, and a stable of stock characters. All the authors who write for this series use Sanctuary as their setting. Moreover, they are encouraged to use not merely the characters from the town's common roster of princelings, functionaries, and petty thieves, but those characters specifically created by the other authors.

Sound familiar? It should. The parallel between the way my anthologies were made and the way FRP games are played is not entirely coincidental.

For many years I had one major complaint regarding Heroic Fantasy: the duplication of effort. If one set out to write a Heroic Fantasy novel, the first requirement was to ignore everything which had gone before. Forget Robert E. Howard's detail in building the Hyborian Age. Ignore the marvelous city of Lankhmar that Fritz Leiber set in the sinking bubble of Newhon. Disregard the countless other creations abounding in literature and start over. Build your own geography, history, political structure, religious system, monetary system, magic system, etc., etc., ad nauseum—and then you can write your story. This is a major reason why so much fantasy winds up as trilogy or open-ended series. Once an author has put that much effort into establishing a setting, it's very difficult to let it stop with just one book.

When I first thought of bucking the system, I was going to do a collection of stories, all set in the same place, but each told from the viewpoint of a different character. The story lines would overlap and a major crisis would affect all the characters equally and differently. I'd always been fond of Japanese cinema, especially Rashomon. But then I encountered FRP games!

Actually I've followed their development and growth eagerly. I've followed them all: Dungeons & Dragons, Tunnels & Trolls, Chivalry & Sorcery, Bunnies & Burrows, and, of course, Chaosium's RuneQuest. While each game has its strengths and weaknesses, I did learn one very important lesson in my days as a Game Master: no matter what potential I saw in a situation, the players would invariably see something different—usually something far more exciting than what I'd thought of.

I realized that my original plan of authoring a collection of short stories bypassed the greater potential of the basic idea. If I wanted stories from different viewpoints, the best way to get them was to get different authors to write them that way. I thus discovered the sub-franchised anthology, and with that revelation Thieves' World was born.

Fortunately I was already a published author at the time I got this brilliant idea. My circle of friends included a fair number of notable authors and artists. I figured I could talk them into it, but I was unprepared for their excitement and willingness to contribute ideas far in excess of the stories I was paying them for. James Oddbert, who drew up the maps of Sanctuary, huddled with Joe Haldeman, Gordon Dickson, and myself and from that late night conversation came the personality of Sanctuary itself. Andy Offutt proposed not one, but two sets of gods which we all accepted virtually unchanged. John Brunner sent the magic system by airmail from South Petherton in England. Poul Anderson provided a set of economic notes worthy of Washington, D.C., and Phil Farmer gave us the money system to make the economy go. Phil also extended our already lengthy list of controlled substances and gave us insight into our civil laws.

A complete account of the contributions would fill a separate volume and even that wouldn't get to the readers whose comments will be incorporated in further volumes of the series. There has been so much input in putting the volumes together that I feel I can say that Sanctuary is the most realistic town in fantasy literature without feeling I'm just congratulating myself (I'm congratulating a lot of people).

One of my greatest prides is in the variety of characters who have been prodded into existence. While you'll find the traditional magicians, adventurers and thieves in Sanctuary, you'll also meet some people who don't normally show up in a Heroic fantasy environment. In our town you'll find slavers, mid-wives, fortune-tellers, caravan masters, blacksmiths, guardsmen, herbologists, madams, minstrels, storytellers, and, surprisingly enough, children. Sanctuary is alive!

The response to Thieves' World and its sequels has been personally gratifying. Thieves' World is into its second printing and has been on science fiction bestseller lists; it was also nominated for Balrog and World Fantasy awards in 1980.

However, the title of this piece is "Full Circle." I was doubly pleased when Greg Stafford contacted me about converting the first two Thieves' World volumes into a gaming format for Chaosium. 'Doubly pleased' because I was not only glad that someone else recognized the gaming potential of my anthology but because it was Chaosium expressing the interest. In the past I had been impressed by the imagination Greg had shown in White Bear & Red Moon [now Dragon Pass] and fascinated by the company's largely successful efforts to keep the appropriate dream-like atmosphere in their boardgame of Michael Moorcock's Elric series. I had often thought that if I had the choice, I would choose them to make Sanctuary into a game.

The Thieves' World game package contains character specifications for all the major FRP formats, not just for Chaosium's RuneQuest. Whatever format a game master favors, Sanctuary is still their town without adapting or juggling anything. Now that's a game publisher, and I'm glad they're my publishers.

So the circle is complete twice over. We have Heroic Fantasy providing the inspiration for the FRP games. Then the games influence a shared-setting anthology. Now that anthology is available in role-playing format. 'Round and 'round it goes . . . and for all our sakes I hope it never stops.

FOREWORD

While fighting, arguing, and other sorts of adventuring are important and have their place, all adventures conclude, and even the greatest adventurer goes home to spend his profits. If he is like most of us, he will try to impress other people with his success. Those other people are found in cities, as are rooms, markets, taverns, libraries, and gyms.

The city is the natural home of every adventurer. The ebb and flow of city life gives opportunity for every type of character. A city is the only environment proper to a full-time thief. Only in cities do many strangers meet, and only in cities is information plentiful. The bigger the city, the more readily are exotic items found or sold.

The city of Sanctuary is ideal for adventuring. It is large enough to be self-supporting, and it lies upon the borderlands between several cultures. Though once greater, it is a rough-and-tumble town now, clutched by several competing power groups, not the least of which is the thriving population of thieves.

This book is for players to read. It contains the common knowledge of the city. Everyone will know this much; it is up to the player-characters to learn more for themselves.

If players are unwilling to read this book, referees should give them little mercy. FRP requires literacy; these background pages are little enough. Players also should read the anthologies which inspired this supplement. The first two are THIEVES' WORLD and TALES FROM THE VULGAR UNICORN, edited by Robert Asprin and published by Ace Books. Those stories are the basis for this work, and they provide all the examples and atmosphere anyone will need. This scenario pack reproduces the special local color of Sanctuary, and together with the books offers a unique opportunity to exploit and explore a developing fantasy realm.

Every game master will have to find a spare peninsula or continent to fit Sanctuary into his or her campaign, but we are confident that the only surgery needed will be in the joining. The city is complete and ready for play. If you have yet to begin a campaign, this supplement is the best place to start, for most of the work is already done!

We hope you enjoy this FRP version of Thieves' World. Please modify it as you wish, and have much fun in using it.

THUD AND BLUNDER

Poul Anderson

This essay by THIEVES' WORLD anthology contributor Poul Anderson originally appeared in SWORDS AGAINST DARKNESS, an anthology edited by Andrew Offutt. It is reprinted here so that players and game masters alike may have a fuller appreciation of the realities of life in Sanctuary.

With one stroke of his fifty-pound sword, Gnorts the Barbarian lopped off the head of Nialliv the Wizard. It flew through the air, still sneering, while Gnorts clove two royal guardsmen from vizor through breastplate to steel jock-strap. As he whirled to escape, an arrow glanced off his own chainmail. Then he was gone from the room, into the midnight city. Easily outrunning pursuit, he took a few sentries at the gate by surprise. For a moment, arms and legs hailed around him through showers of blood; he had opened the gate and was free. A caravan of merchants, waiting to enter at dawn, was camped nearby. Seeing a magnificent stallion tethered, Gnorts released it, twisted the rope into a bridle, and rode it off bareback. After galloping several miles, he encountered a mounted patrol that challenged him. Immediately he plunged into the thick of the cavalrymen, swinging his blade right and left with deadly effect, rearing up his steed to bring its forefeet against one knight who dared to confront him directly. Then it was only to gallop onward. Winter winds lashed his body, attired in nothing more than a bearskin kilt, but he ignored the cold. Sunrise revealed the shore and his waiting longship. He knew the swift-sailing craft could bring him across five hundred leagues of monster-infested ocean in time for him to snatch the maiden princess Elamef away from evil Baron Rehcel while she remained a maiden—not that he intended to leave her in that condition. . .

Exaggerated? Of course. But, unfortunately, not much, where some stories are concerned.

Today's rising popularity of heroic fantasy, or sword-and-sorcery as it is also called, is certainly a Good Thing for those of us who enjoy it. Probably this is part of a larger movement back toward old-fashioned storytelling, with colorful backgrounds, events, and characters, tales wherein people do take arms against a sea of troubles and usually win. Such literature is not inherently superior to the introspective or symbolic kinds, but neither is it inherently inferior; Homer and James Joyce were both great artists.

Yet every kind of writing is prone to special faults. For example, while no one expects heroic fantasy (hf) to be of ultimate psychological profundity, it is often simple to the point of being simplistic. This is not necessary, as such fine practitioners as de Camp, Leiber, and Tolkien have proven.

Worse, because it is still more obvious and still less excusable, is a frequent lack of elementary knowledge or plain common sense on the part of an author. A small minority of hf stories is set in real historical milieus, where the facts provide a degree of control—though howling errors remain all too easy to make. Most members of the genre, however, take place in an imaginary world. It may be a pre-glacial civilization like Howard's, an altered time-line like Kurtz's, another planet like Edison's, a remote future like Vance's, a completely invented universe like Dunsany's, or what have you; the point is, nobody pretends this is aught but a Never-Never Land, wherein the author is free to arrange geography, history, theology, and the laws of nature to suit himself. Given that freedom, far too many writers nowadays have supposed that anything whatsoever goes, that practical day-to-day details are of no importance and hence they, the writers, have no homework to do before they start spinning their yarns.

Not so! The consequence of making that assumption is, inevitably, a sleazy product. It may be bought by an editor hard up for material, but it will carry none of the conviction, the illusion of reality, which helps make the work of the people mentioned above, and other good writers, memorable. At best, it will drop into oblivion; at worst, it will stand as an awful example. If our field becomes swamped with this kind of garbage, readers are going to go elsewhere for entertainment and there will be no more hf.

Beneath the magic, derring-do, and other glamor, an imaginary world has to work right. In particular, a pre-industrial society, which is what virtually all hf uses for a setting, differs from ours today in countless ways. A writer need not be a walking encyclopedia to get most of these straight. A reasonable amount of research, or sometimes merely a reasonable amount of logical thinking, will do it for him. Let's consider a few points. A proper discussion would require a book, but we can make a start.

First, some remarks on those societies. Most cultures in hf are based on the European, often as a mishmash of Roman Empire, Dark Ages, and high Middle Ages with a bit of Pharaonic Egypt, Asian nomadism, and so forth on the fringes. This is not bad in itself. Howard succeeded with it. And indeed, the western end of the Eurasian continent was a similar potpourri during the Volkerwanderung period (if you regard the Byzantine Empire as the civilized core of Christendom). I do think the time is overpast for drawing inspiration from other milieus—Oriental, Near Eastern, North and Black African, Amerindian, Polynesian, an entire world—and am happy to see that several writers have begun doing so. However, in this essay I'll stick close to home.

Even the writers I have cited say little about the producing classes in their worlds, with the notable exception of de Camp. Yet the fact is that it takes a lot of peasants, artisans, and such-like humble people to support one noble or, for that matter, one bandit or roving barbarian. We tend to forget this in our mechanized modern Western civilization, where only a small percentage of the work force is occupied with the necessities of life. Right up till the early part of the twentieth century, though, most of our own population was rural, as most of it still is elsewhere on Earth. In town, the typical worker was not one of the kind we know, putting in forty comparatively easy hours a week, owning a house and car and the other customary amenities. No, he was a dirt-poor hod carrier or ditch digger or something like that, laboring almost till he dropped of exhaustion and glad to get the job. While unions doubtless helped improve his lot, they could not have done so without the increased productivity which advancing technology made possible.

Thus our creator of hf can gain verisimilitude and interesting detail by paying some attention to the lower classes, the vast majority of his world's population. Besides, their situation affects what his hero can do. For example, in many medieval countries, the peasants were subject to a military draft; the king could summon them to fight his wars for him. However, the time of year at which he could do so was strictly circumscribed by law. He couldn't call them up before the crops were in, or keep them till harvest, lest everybody starve. Harold of England faced this problem in 1066. William of Normandy, commanding mostly mercenaries and adventurers, did not to the same degree.

Incidentally, mercenaries are not always reliable. They tend to make trouble if they don't get paid—and medieval monarchs were chronically short of money. Early in the fourteenth century, a troop of Catalans practically took the Byzantine Empire apart on that account. Mercenaries are also likely to be more interested in their own survival and prerogatives, especially loot, than in furthering the interests of their employers. The backbone of Rome was the yeoman farmer class, from which the legions were recruited; when this was destroyed by the Punic Wars and their aftermath, and Rome had gradually to go more and more to hirelings, her doom was sealed. A number of good hf stories lie in this motif.

Returning to peasants, laborers, merchants, and the rest, these words are too general. How well off are such people, how leisured, how independent? That has varied tremendously throughout history. Free landholders in Scandinavia would originally get together to make their own laws, try their own cases, accept a new king and then depose him later if they didn't like him. Their descendants became wretched tenants and, in Denmark, outright serfs. In contrast, though, by our standards workers in cities put in long, hard hours and were under many restrictions: still, after the Black Death had furnished a convenient labor shortage, they were comparatively well off. In fact, for some centuries they enjoyed more leisure, in the form of frequent holidays, than we do now.

Thus the status of ordinary people has depended on social conditions as much as technological. If taxes and other governmental demands on them were moderate, they had plenty of spare time and energy, in between bouts of toil that would kill many of us today. As those demands grew, so did their misery. Of course, in either case they were subject to famines and pestilences—another detail unmentioned in most hf, yet potent narrative matter.

A medieval city was curiously divided. On the one hand, the respectable part of it was highly structured, with guilds controlling much of the private lives as well as the work of members. On the other hand, the poor sector was chaotic and dangerous, as we may read in the poems of Villon. Between Internal Revenue and welfare, we seem to be re-approaching this dichotomy. We do still have fairly sharp geographical separation of urban classes. In an ancient or medieval town, any districts that existed were usually along occupational lines. A rich merchant would live near the appropriate street, but his house would be apt to stand like an island in the middle of poverty, vice, and savagery. This could make our hero's abrupt exit from it more interesting than he intended.

If he left after dark, he would scarcely run as trippingly as we have shown Gnorts the Barbarian doing. People who have experienced blackouts will tell you that a nighted city without the modern invention of lights is black. With walls shutting off most of the sky—especially along narrow medieval streets—it is far gloomier than any open field. You'd grope your way, unless you had a torch or lantern (and then you'd better have an armed guard). Furthermore, those lanes were open sewers; in many places, stepping stones went down the middle because of that. Despite sanitary measures, metropolitan streets as late as about 1900 were often uncrossable simply because of horse droppings. Graveyards stank too: one reason why incense was used in church services.

This brings up again the prevalence of diseases such as cholera, typhoid, smallpox, and bubonic plague. They struck especially hard at cities. The fear of them was ever-present in everybody's mind. That detail could be worked into a story to telling effect.

Darkness and crime did call forth partial answers. For instance, professional escorts carrying lights were available. The Byzantines in their heyday had a regular police force, while in many Western cities of a later date each able-bodied man must help patrol his own neighborhood. I should think a wandering warrior might quickly get a job as a cop, and thereby come upon strange situations.

Or he might not. Travel could be extremely difficult, not merely because of physical problems and robbers, but because of official wariness. Fire being another hazard very much in the public awareness, you could not get into a Danish town around 1500 without convincing documentation; the fear of foreign arsonists was that great. (Doubtless it was unfounded, but we've seen enough popular paranoia in our own age, haven't we?) Elsewhere, the mayoralty might suppose you were a spy, or the guilds might not want to admit a new worker. (Again, this sounds not unfamiliar.) Contretemps like these could add depth, color, and perhaps humor to the adventures of our hero.

In fact, the whole relationship between a city and the rest of its society can be fascinating. It need not be borrowed from Western history, either—"city air is free air," the rise of the bourgeoisie, and so on. Ancient Russia, for instance, followed a course almost the reverse of ours: beginning with cities and capitalism, which stimulated agricultural development of the hinterlands.

Politics in general is much neglected in hf. Usually its governments are absolute monarchies, whether of kings or emperors, though the real world has known many different arrangements. If the monarch is tyrannical, our hero may lead a revolt and find himself the next ruler. Little or nothing is said about the infinitely intricate mechanics of organizing a rebellion or, for that matter, about the legal questions involved. Can Gnorts truly seize the throne? He'll have to have an acquiescent majority, at the very least; else his regime won't last an hour. Now Odoacer the Scyrian could push the legitimate Roman Emperor out in 476—but he hastened to offer homage to Constantinople; and at that, his power was shaky and soon overthrown. No outsider could have won such a title in the Eastern Empire, whose lord had to be a citizen and of the Orthodox faith. The Crusaders did impose a Latin reign in 1204, but it was loathed and the Byzantines got rid of it as fast as they were able.

Howard could make Conan's accession reasonably plausible. The rest of us might do better to make our hero the power behind the throne. In fact, why must he be a barbarian? A civilized man influencing an uncivilized conqueror, as Ye Liu Chutsai did Genghis Khan, may give a far more intriguing story, in either sense of the word.

In any event, the monarchy or oligarchy won't be the sole mover of society. It has never been, not even in the contemporary Soviet Union and slave China. There are always other interests and groups whose leaders must be conciliated. An obvious example is the late J. Edgar Hoover; theoretically, any President could summarily have dismissed him, but in practice that was a political impossibility. More to the point, perhaps, are the consequences to Henry II of England when he had Thomas a Becket assassinated. Indeed, the ever-changing inter-relationships of kings, nobles, and Church form a major part of the medieval European tapestry. One can go on to power groups in more distant lands, such as the Janissaries in Turkey or the Shogunate in Japan, to find endless complications which are the stuff of exciting tales.

(One hf novel that handles politics superbly well, and is a fine story in every other respect too, is The Well of the Unicorn by Fletcher Pratt. If you haven't already read it, do.)

The Church raises the subject of religion in general, which is little used in our field. Oh, yes, we may get a hero swearing by his particular gods and perhaps carrying through a small rite, equivalent to stroking a rabbit's foot. We certainly get plenty of obscene ceremonies in honor of assorted toad-like beings. Both of these do have their historical counterparts. Nevertheless, it would be interesting to see an imaginary society which was pervaded by its faith, as many real ones have been.

One way or another, religion is usually the wellspring of literacy. If Never-Never Land has no printing press or public schools, how many people can read? How did they learn? How common is paper or some equally cheap, convenient material to write upon? Who produces and who sells it, under what conditions? How do letters travel? Questions like these could well be crucial to our hero.

The available transportation positively is. Now we are so accustomed to reasonably reliable and well-sprung automobiles on smooth roads, when we don't fly, that we have almost forgotten how hard and slow it once was to get from here to there. Most people in the past spent their entire lives in walking distance of wherever they were born. This must deeply have affected their personalities, even as mobility has affected ours.

he Romans, improving on the example of the Persians, knit their empire together with excellent paved highways. These were for armies and imperial messengers. Ordinary people could use them, but that wasn't the main idea, and doubtless most civilian traffic continued to be over dirt tracks. Anyone who has hiked or marched through mud will appreciate the importance of a proper military road. When Rome had fallen and commerce shrank down to local trading, most of this network was quarried. In the Middle Ages, a landholder could help guarantee his salvation—and collect tolls—by building and maintaining a road or bridge. It was that important to everyone. Not just mud, but wilderness impeded travel. Huge areas of Europe were covered by forest that, because of underbrush, was literally impassable; some coastal communities could be reached only by sea. If given a reasonable surface to roll on, chariots, wagons, and coaches remained exhausting things in which to ride. After a day of such vibration, the passenger would feel as if he'd been through a meat grinder. The brutality of it is epitomized by the fact that, in the nineteenth century, the working life of a coach horse was reckoned at four years.

Thus our hero will usually do better to go pedestrian or equestrian. As for the latter choice, writers who've had no personal experience with horses tend to think of them as a kind of sports car. 'Tain't so.

You cannot gallop them for hours. They'll collapse. The best way to make time in the saddle is to alternate paces, and have a remount or two trailing behind, and allow the animals reasonable rest. Don't let your steed eat or drink indiscriminately; it's likely to bloat and become helpless. In fact, it's a rather fragile creature, requiring close attention—for example, rubdowns after hard exertion—if it isn't to fall sick and perhaps die on you. It's also lazy, stupid, and sometimes malicious. All of these tendencies the rider must keep under control.

You cannot grab any old horse and go to battle on it. It'll instantly become unmanageable. Several of us in the Society for Creative Anachronism tried a little harmless jousting, and soon gave up. . .and this was with beasts whose owners were already practicing the more pacific equestrian arts, such as tilting at a ring. War horses had to be raised to it from colthood. The best cavalrymen were, too. Lacking that tradition, the Vikings, for instance, never fought mounted. Upon landing in a victim country, they'd steal themselves four-legged transportation, but having reached a scene of action, they'd get down.

Cavalry was of no particular importance in Europe until about the sixth century, when stirrups were introduced from the East. Before then, combatants were too likely to fall off. Earlier, the chief military use of the horse had been with chariots: until the Greek hoplite and Roman legionary learned how to cope with these. Later, nobody riding bareback stood a chance against an enemy who had a proper saddle.

Frequently in hf, and for that matter in h'f and Wf (historical and Western fantasy), the hero cavorts around on a snorting stallion. Now this has been done in reality, but seldom, and that for good reason. A stallion is notoriously hard to control, and, by the way, is not safe to have around a menstruating woman. (Of course, hf heroines never seem to menstruate, which may account for the fact that they don't get pregnant, no matter how active in bed.) A mare or, better, a gelding, is preferable.

Our hero is going to face practical problems in getting around on land. The same will apply if he goes by sea. I'll say nothing about pirates, though in most eras they posed a considerable hazard. I will mention that, even under the Roman Empire, more often than not it paid to travel across the water; terrestrial transportation was that bad. Nevertheless....

Ships in hf normally have sails but act as if they had Diesel engines. They take the lead character where he wants to go, fast, effortlessly, and comfortably. They are never becalmed and they never meet weeks of foul weather. In spite of being square-rigged, they can go as close to the wind as the captain chooses. (Ah, many's the time I've wished I could make a well-designed sloop do that. But it took most of a morning, for instance, to work out of one quite small bay. In the nineteenth century, ships would sometimes lie in Honolulu harbor for months, waiting for the right wind to blow them across the Pacific.) These same vessels have abundant elbow room for everybody; food and water are always palatable; there are no special housekeeping problems. (In actuality the First Law of the Sea, as formulated by Jerry Pournelle and myself, is: "It's in the bilge!") Sometimes, in both hf and h'f, we have galley slaves. Again, authors are inclined to treat them as if they were engines; they don't get sick, they don't stink, you don't have to keep a guard on them lest they revolt. In real history, rowers were only used on naval vessels, and for the most part were free men, well paid. Galley slaves were not a Roman but a late medieval invention, brought about by the need to bring cannon to bear on short notice.

The average hf sailor has no navigation woes. Yet this problem wasn't solved till the eighteenth century, with the development of the chronometer—and the story of that R & D effort is a complex one, full of human bitchiness. To this day, the solution is not perfect. Ask a seaman to tell you what it's like, using a modern sextant, to get a decent sight on a star. Nor has electronics made locating yourself automatic and infallible, short of the most highly advanced inertial systems. So imagine an early Norseman bound from Oslo to Greenland. He has a knowledge of landmarks and the heavens when these are visible; a peg will help him estimate his latitude if a clear day allows it to cast a shadow, and the natural polarizing filter he calls a "sunstone" will help him locate the solar orb in cloudy weather; but these aids give him only the crudest approximations, while longitude is a matter of sheer dead reckoning or guesswork. Seaweed, bird flights, and similar indications are probably more helpful; indeed, he may well carry some birds in a cage, release them one at a time when he thinks he may be near a shore, and watch which way they go. Chances are that he'll make landfall a goodly distance from his goal and have to work along the coast to find it.

Compass, astrolabe, and a few other advances improved matters as the Middle Ages wore on, but not greatly. If his story is to be convincing, our intinerant barbarian will not travel without lots of difficulty, discomfort, and delay.

Presumably he's bound for someplace where he can fight. After he arrives on the battlefield, he will still face a host of complications. Let me merely observe in passing that, right up until World War Two, far more soldiers died of disease than they did in action; that the outcome of a siege was frequently determined by whether the attackers took sick faster than the defenders starved; and that germs were sometimes the arbiters of entire wars. Let me suggest that this, too, is a realistic motif which hf writers could occasionally use to advantage. Now let's get on to actual combat.

First, consider again the sociology of it. Incomparably drilled and disciplined, the Roman legionary almost always made hash of his foes, until the society which had produced him had rotted away. In medieval England, every yeoman of military age was required by law to have a longbow and spend a set number of hours per week practicing with it.

As a result, the English archers during the Hundred Years' War were the terror of the French, who tried to raise a similar corps but failed because they hadn't institutionalized the training. In general, the civil background of an army is the most important element in its long-range success or failure, with its own organization and morale a close second. Half-trained barbarians may win a fluke victory over civilized troops once in a while, but that won't count for much. They can prevail over a civilization only after it has ruined itself.

Technology counts too, of course, though sometimes in paradoxical ways. The longbow was driven off the field by the crossbow and later the crossbow by the musket, not because these weapons were successively superior—they weren't—but because it was successively quicker and easier to teach a man their use. The hf writer ought to visualize just what kind of arms his characters employ, and think through the military implications.

As for hand-to-hand fights, it would doubtless be unfair to demand that he belong to the SCA or go in for fencing or javelin throwing or archery. We'll have to bear with heroes' occasional ignorance of technique. That would soon prove fatal in real life; luckily, fictional villains share the ignorance.

However, can't the author do a little reading in encyclopedias, under headings like "Fencing"? And is it too much trouble to delve further than that? Any reasonably sized public or college library must contain some relevant books. If nothing else, can't he take half a minute to visualize before he writes?

If he does, he'll instantly see that nobody in his right mind would grab a sword two-handed, raise it over his head, and chop straight down, exposing his belly all that while. The use of those huge Reformation-period two-handers was a highly developed art whose practitioners were specialists.

Carrying a shield, you're as apt to work around its edge as over the top. By the way, the purpose of that shield is to stay between you and your enemy's weapon, not to act as a counterweight to a roundhouse swing. There are tricks you can play with it, such as using its edge to lever your opponent's shield out of your way, but I've rarely seen fantasy warriors do anything so skillful.

Artists tend to be still worse offenders than authors—for instance, depicting a man wielding a dagger overhand, and, while they're at it, dressing the poor guy in nothing but a bearskin kilt in a winter landscape or on a horse. (For a human male, the latter placement is much the worse.)

Nobody can wield a fifty-pound sword; he'd wear his arm out in short order. An ax or mace, largely dependent on sheer mass for beating through an enemy's guard, is nowhere near that heavy either. A replicated ax, Battle of Hastings type, in my possession, weighs a bit under five pounds. Nevertheless, it takes muscle to swing any edged weapon. Therefore I suspect that a woman-at-arms would look less like Dejah Thoris than Rosie the Riveter. In fact, we have no reliable records of female warriors. Joan of Arc commanded; she did not engage in combat.

True, primary sources can't always be trusted. Thus, in the generally realistic Icelandic sagas, you find a few references to somebody's cutting a head or limb off somebody else with a single stroke. Try this on a pork roast, suspended without a chopping block, and see how far you get.

It could be done with the best of the classic Japanese swords, which are marvels of metallurgy. However, one of these must be treated very carefully if it isn't to be ruined. The mere touch of a finger can induce corrosion.

The cruder blades of Europe demanded still closer attention. Edged weapons are more fragile than one might think, especially if they are bronze or medieval-type steel. Those quickly go blunt and become simple clubs; oftentimes they bend and must be more or less straightened with a foot and an oath; they can break. Not even with a samurai sword do you cut through armor.

At the same time, armor does have its vulnerabilities. These are not so much to the thrust or the cleaving blow. I have witnessed SCA experiments in which chain mail made from coat hanger wire, backed by a hay bale, could not be penetrated by sword, ax, or spear. Obviously only repeated impacts on the same spot could fatigue the metal enough to let a weapon through. Plate armor should be still harder. Bear in mind that, in both cases, padding was worn beneath. Still, if a man was getting hit hour after hour, eventually it might prove too much for his body to endure, if heat prostration didn't get him first.

Armor of either kind could be pierced by a hard-driven arrow, from longbow or crossbow. These devices had their own limitations. I have already mentioned how much training was necessary to make the former effective. Though not an archer myself, I am skeptical about hundred-pound draws; it seems to me that, for accuracy and rate of fire, seventy-five might be a more reasonable figure. As for crossbows, though their bolts struck equally hard, they were considerably slower than longbows. As said, their decisive advantage was that they were easier to learn to use.

If armor is not involved, then ordinarily in fiction, a single blow, thrust, or arrow suffices to drop a man or a horse dead on the spot. Actually, so large an animal is quite hard to kill. The .45 caliber pistol was developed specifically as a man-stopper, and still men hit from one have been known to keep on coming. If swordsmen generally run their foes right through the heart. Well, not only is the heart a fairly small target whose exact location is hard to identify, but it's pretty well protected by the rib cage. Personally, I'd go for the throat—the larynx is highly vulnerable, not to speak of the jugular vein or carotid arteries—or the abdomen, where I might slash another big artery or have a chance of skewering the liver—or the legs, in hopes of crippling my opponent.

The back of the neck is another weak point, if you can get at it, as with a hefty rabbit punch. The skull is stronger, though it can be smashed with a heavy weapon and a lighter blow may render the victim unconscious. Here hf and mf (mystery fantasy) writers make man out to be more durable than he is. Their heroes get knocked out, awoken after a while as if from a nap, and plunge right back into action. The truth is, a mild concussion is disabling for periods ranging from hours to days, and for a severe one, the consequences are not pleasant to watch.

If you wish further possibilities for mayhem, I refer you to experts in karate. Techniques of this kind seldom occur in hf, but surely they could enliven some stories.

We have less scope where poisons are concerned, common though they are in fiction. Medieval and Renaissance princes lived in terror of these, but the fact is that prior to modern chemistry, there were virtually no quick-acting toxins you could slip to somebody unbeknownst or on the point of a weapon. Curare is about all that comes to mind, and that's South American. Indeed, I've seen a couple of Renaissance recipes for poisons to feed dinner guests, and the main question about them is how anybody ever imagined anybody else could ever gag down enough of that awful stuff to suffer serious damage.

Arsenic was about the deadliest substance readily available with a few competitors like hemlock, toadstools, and ground glass. The problem was usually to disguise the taste. In any event, while a person could occasionally be given a lethal dose, he would hardly drop dead at once. He'd be a considerable and messy time about his demise. I rather imagine that quite a few deaths that were attributed to deliberate poisoning were actually caused by botulism or the like.

Lest the foregoing seem bloodthirsty, let me add that another flaw in most hf is the glossing over of pain, mauling, and the ordinarily grim process of dying. True, we don't want to get sadistic. And as a rule, we presume an era less sensitive than ours; most have been. And we're writing and reading for fun, not to preach moral lessons or harrow emotions. Still, a bit more realism in this respect too would lend convincingness.

We can then swing back to cheerful matters, such as harvest festivals, drunken evenings in taverns, and fertility rites where sympathetic magic gets totally sympathetic. We can let our hero have all kinds of adventures, buckle all kinds of swashes. I merely submit that he ought to do so in a world which, however thaumaturgical, makes sense. The more it does, the more the reader will enjoy—and the more he will come back for more.

THE CITY AND ITS PEOPLE

Greg Stafford
Mary Beth Miller
Steve Perrin

Sanctuary was originally built about 175 years ago by runaway slaves of the Iisig Kingdom. It was conquered 152 years ago by the Iisig fleet and had a prosperous career as part of the Iisig Kingdom until it was conquered by the Rankan Empire about 60 years ago.

Sanctuary survives by importing some grain by sea, and also depends upon the rich fishing banks which lie to the south. The fields surrounding the city are all possessions of some of the Rankan nobility and are worked by slaves and indentured serfs.

Sanctuary is about 1/2 mile long (720 meters) on the north-south axis, and is about 2/3 mile (1 kilometer) wide on the east-west. It is divided into several portions which are shown on the city map.

The major city is divided into three parts: Jewelers' Quarter, Processional, and Westside. The western border of Jewelers' Quarter is on Weavers Way and the Corridor of Steel. Upper class people live here, with rich shops and luxurious homes. They commonly hire private guards for their part of the city. We can define the rich as nobility who do not have a place in the palace, as heads and masters of guilds, as the more successful business people (no matter what their commodity), and as exiled foreigners who brought a bundle when they fled their homelands. Taverns here are not rowdy, and it is more likely that meetings will be held in private than in public. Even so, there is always the chance of trouble, especially if you are from another part of town.

The middle section is called Processional and its western border is Westgate Street. The town watch patrols here regularly, but people usually can't afford private guards. Many shop owners and workers have had some military service, and some of these businesses are owned by retired adventurers and mercenaries. Apartments are very common here and families are likely to live in a couple of rooms rather than owning their homes. Most permanent residents here are employees of people who own the shops here or in the richer part of town.

The west side of the city is called Westside and its borders are Westgate Street and the river. It is the poor side of town and a tough neighborhood avoided by people from the rest of the city. Part of this neighborhood is called The Maze, and is avoided even by residents of Westside! The Maze is the hangout of thieves, murderers, felons, and the very unlucky.

Other special areas are the Bazaar, where merchants gather and cultures mingle; the Street of Red Lanterns, an area of hedonism; and the Avenue of the Temples, where the gods are worshipped.

Downwind is across the river and is so utterly despicable that no one would live there who could avoid it. The buildings are fragile hovels and huts, and the residents are desperate or derelict. There is little to gain here. Even thieves avoid it.

As a way to understand the size of Sanctuary, we can measure the time needed to cross the city. At a dead run, an average runner would take about three minutes to dash from the dock up Processional to the front of the Governor's Palace. Likewise, it would take eight minutes to sprint from the Avenue of the Temples to the Swamp of Night Secrets. A galloping horse would halve those times. However, it is unlikely that anyone could make such a dash, either on foot or mounted, except at night when the streets are empty. And at night a runner would have to pass guardposts whose sentinels would take special interest in the motives of the runner.

The poorest workers are up and about before dawn. As the sun rises, the streets become more and more crowded. As the air warms, street dust, the smells of cooking, and whatever odors emanate from local industry fill it, and another day is underway.

Throughout the whole day, the whole of the squares and major streets would be very crowded. It would be impossible to run through such an area without continuously knocking people down. People normally move at a slow walk, though someone might move at a faster, skipping or sidling gait if they slid between and among people.

At the slower rate it would take at least 30 minutes to traverse from the docks to the palace, or 60 minutes from the Avenue of the Temples to the Swamp of Night Secrets. At the hastened pace it would take about half that time.

Horses, by their bulk, can force their way through the crowd. Galloping horses will cause a panic, covering the streets with prone bodies, which would hamper even charging destriers.

Criers normally precede any official. The voice of the crier should warn people to move aside. The burly guards behind the crier will shove aside those who do not hear, to make way for their master's horse, sedan chair, or carriage. Smaller, less-crowded streets also cross town, but though one can move faster, these streets tend to meander, making the total distance longer, and giving about the same total trip time as by a main street. It is more likely that someone can run or jog in these streets, though horses still would be held to a walk.

The crowds thin as darkness approaches. All good citizens try to be safely in their homes by dark. Again, the poor have the farthest to go and will be out the latest.

After dark, few people venture out. The Downwinders creep forth to empty chamberpots and then bring their contents to tanners and farriers. Downwinders can be recognized by their overwhelming smell. The Nightwatch appears: though they are most likely to patrol the places where people pay them the best, they also will be found in the Processional section of town. They double as firemen as well as policemen. Thieves of all descriptions also find it useful to be out at night, creeping in shadows and across rooftops and through alleys, leaving the wide streets to the guardsmen and hapless innocents caught abroad.

Sanctuary's people are primarily of Iisig stock. They are a varied and disparate lot, disorganized and likely to seek their self-interests before the interests of the city. In that way they become followers of city leaders and factions. Clinging even to foreigners who offer them safety or other reward. There are obvious powers in the city. These include the Governor, who controls the official government; Gordonesh, the head of the Iisig temple, who speaks for the oppressed Iisigs; Jubal, who is the unannounced king of the Underworld; Myrtis, queen of the Street of Red Lanterns, and Molin Torchholder, high priest and engineer of Savankala.

Groups also center about the cultural affiliations of lesser leaders. Every leader is from someplace, and generally keeps the trappings and ways of the spawning culture. People from particular regions naturally gravitate towards native leaders. So do native Iisigs, if it serves their purposes.

Each of these cultural groups has a home area centered on a cross-street. "Home area" might be a poor part of the city, a ghetto, or it might center upon a proud stronghouse in the Processional, with apartments nearby stuffed with loyal regionalists. Whatever it is, the area would house them, and the area shops and businesses would cater to their needs. There would also be, almost by necessity, a tavern where strangers of the faction could go when they first came to the city and where they would be sure of finding someone who spoke their tongue and who would give them honest answers.

The main cultural groupings of people are the mountain tribes, who have no common name; the Raggah, who are aloof desert nomads; the S'danzo, a gypsy-like people who wander the continent; the Rankans, whose citizens are like foreigners here; and the Sailing Peoples, who come from across the seas from many places.

The mountain tribes have no common name because they are a badly organized tribal people whose geography prohibits unity. They are fierce, hardened by their tough life, and proud of their ways. City-dwellers categorize all mountain people as barbarians.

The Raggah are frighteningly hard people dressed in robes, who hail from the desert. Though they are small in number, their tribes have never been tamed. They are a close people who keep savagely to their ways, shunning anyone not purified by the blistering desert sun. They are keen assassins with a reputation of high salary for a sure job.

The S'danzo are explained elsewhere.

The Sailing Peoples is a collective name for the people from overseas. They naturally collect near the dockyards, many being sailors or importers. Of the known lands, Caronne, Cleea, and Banmalt are well-represented.

MAGICIANS

Much more than its putative population and economic condition would indicate, Sanctuary seems to collect magicians. This is largely due to the constant regulation and repression of the magician's art in other parts of the Rankan Empire and outside lands.

Residing in Sanctuary and occasionally found in the streets are Enas Yorl, thaumaturge extraordinaire, Miraith the commercial wizard, Miraith's sons, Stefab, Nestaph, and Marype, and Miraith's main rival, Markmor. Kemren the Purple Sage plays hermit on the island of Shugthee in the White Foal river. Recent visitors include Lythande and Rabben Half-Hand of the Blue Star, Cime the wizard-killer, and Hazard-class enchanter Alain Aspect. All of these are master magicians. Lesser bush-wizards of every description, including not a few charlatans, are commonly found here.

Whatever their ability, the magicians are feared by the common people. "As reliable as a wizard's promise," is a common measure of unreliability, and most people will do anything to keep from being involved in the affairs of wizards. Warriors especially disdain and distrust the subtler aspects of magic.

Obviously then, the ability to conquer one's innate fear of magic and magicians is a valuable trait in Sanctuary. When magicians are used to inspire fear and quivering in the masses, a person who can deal with them fearlessly if given the chance, is on a slightly more equal footing.

There is a close parallel between the relation of the populace and the magicians, and those of the magicians and the gods. White magicians such as Lythande and Enas Yorl will, occasionally, mediate between gods and humans, intervening to explain to their victims the actions of the gods. Yet, despite their great knowledge and power, such mages refuse to attempt any other influence on the affairs of the gods, just as the common populace refuses to meddle in the affairs of magicians.

WORKING WOMEN

Brothels are in a district known as the Street of Red Lanterns, located at the north edge of Sanctuary outside the city walls. Also known as Red Lanterns, Red Lantern Road, or Red Lantern Street, this area includes taverns and gambling dens, as well as many Houses, ranging from the luxurious Aphrodisia House run by Madame Myrtis to those catering to special needs or exotic tastes, such as the House of Whips or the House of Mermaids run by Gelicia. An example of an average House is the Golden Lily, run by Amoli.

Women who work in Red Lanterns agree that the best Madame to work for is Myrtis, since she recruits only those who have a taste for the life and she allows them to keep their children if they desire. Many of her girls have gone on to open their own establishments. The Aphrodisia House is considered to be top-of-the-line both by the working women and by customers. Myrtis' success and her long-lasting beauty are believed to be the result of sorcery performed by her patron and/or lover, Lythande, and this is the subject of much gossip.

The Aphrodisia House is exceptional, however, since most madams use poverty and addiction to krrf as levers to recruit and keep women working for them. It is rumored that Amoli herself is addicted to krrf.

In the better Houses, the style and color of veils worn by the women indicate price and specialties. The houses inside the Maze, such as the Slippery Lily, have notorious reputations, and only pathetic women, diseased, degraded, and at the end of their careers, will work there. There are also free-lancers who work the streets and taverns, carrying small red lanterns, but this traffic is officially confined to the Maze.

The lot of the working women of Red Lanterns has improved because of the recent widespread availability of Dalin, the fool-proof, herbal abortifacient which had formerly been prohibitively expensive and available only to upper-class Rankan women. Birth control methods are crude and the diaphragm, while known, has not been widely used as it is considered to be inconvenient (although Amoli is rumored to wear a diaphragm with an attached spring-loaded razor). It is said that Lythande was involved in the financial machinations which resulted in the sudden lowering of price and availability of Dalin, but this rumor is unsubstantiated.

THE S'DANZO

The precise origin of the S'danzo people is unknown, although there are many legends about this. Some say they are descendants of Enlibar, but the orange-pickers who presently claim that heritage vehemently deny kinship. Some say that the S'danzo are refugees from the contoured cities, or that they have just been around since time out of mind. The S'danzo are very close-mouthed and tightly-knit, and have revealed little about themselves. They have their own language, generally unknown to outsiders, although a few words have passed into common usage. (Ironically, their word "shavakh" which means "outsider" is one of these.) It's considered a mark of sophistication to drop a S'danzo word or two casually into your conversation. They, themselves, use the quotidian street talk in public.

They are a wandering people of many tribes or families, hounded by the government of Ilsig and suppressed by Ranke. Many have migrated to Sanctuary where their presence is tolerated by the Rankan government. Sanctuary has the largest population of non-migrating S'danzo, and it could be considered the 'capital' of a people who are primarily migrants and wanderers. They form a colorful and significant part of Sanctuarian society. Having settled mainly in the Bazaar area, where they make their living, the S'danzo, with their codes and traditions, have contributed to the safety and stability of the neighborhood, so much so that the Bazaar folk, many of them non-S'danzo, simply hang a rope across their doorways to indicate their absence, rather than using locks.

The S'danzo are female-dominated, although it is believed that actual material inheritance passes through the male line. All S'danzo women possess, to some extent, occult ability. (This is believed to be genetically linked.) This ability can be increased by training and practice. S'danzo men engage in marginal activities, such as fencing stolen goods, etc., and the women are the primary decision-makers and bread-winners, most of them working in the Bazaar as fortune tellers and seers. They use many methods of divination, some of which are: reading the palm, the stars, the numbers, the coins, the cards; scrying by crystal, by flame, by ink, by water, by silk; trance; and the laying-on of hands. It is known that the S'danzo do not foretell death when they see it. They do not like to get involved in the affairs of either gods or mages, but are often drawn in unwillingly because of their occult abilities. It is believed that some S'danzo themselves have magical powers of a low order.

EVERYBODY KNOWS 'EM

PRINCE KADAKITHIS

The prince is a brother to the Emperor of Ranke. Kadakithis has the decency to maintain only a very small band of professional soldiers, called Hell Hounds.

JUBAL

Jubal is an ex-gladiator who has spent his lifetime taking revenge on the world. He is the king of the Underworld, though by no means does he rule all the unlawful activity of the city. He has many people in his private army of sell-swords. These mercenaries are called hawkmasks, because of the characteristic masks they wear to hide their identity while on missions for Jubal.

MOLIN TORCHHOLDER

He is High Priest of Savankala and the rest of the Rankan triad. His mission is to build stately temples for his gods.

GORDONESH

Archpriest of Ils, a crotchety old man who spends his time in senile contemplations of his religion's fall. Smart money is on his assistant Mikon to replace him soon.

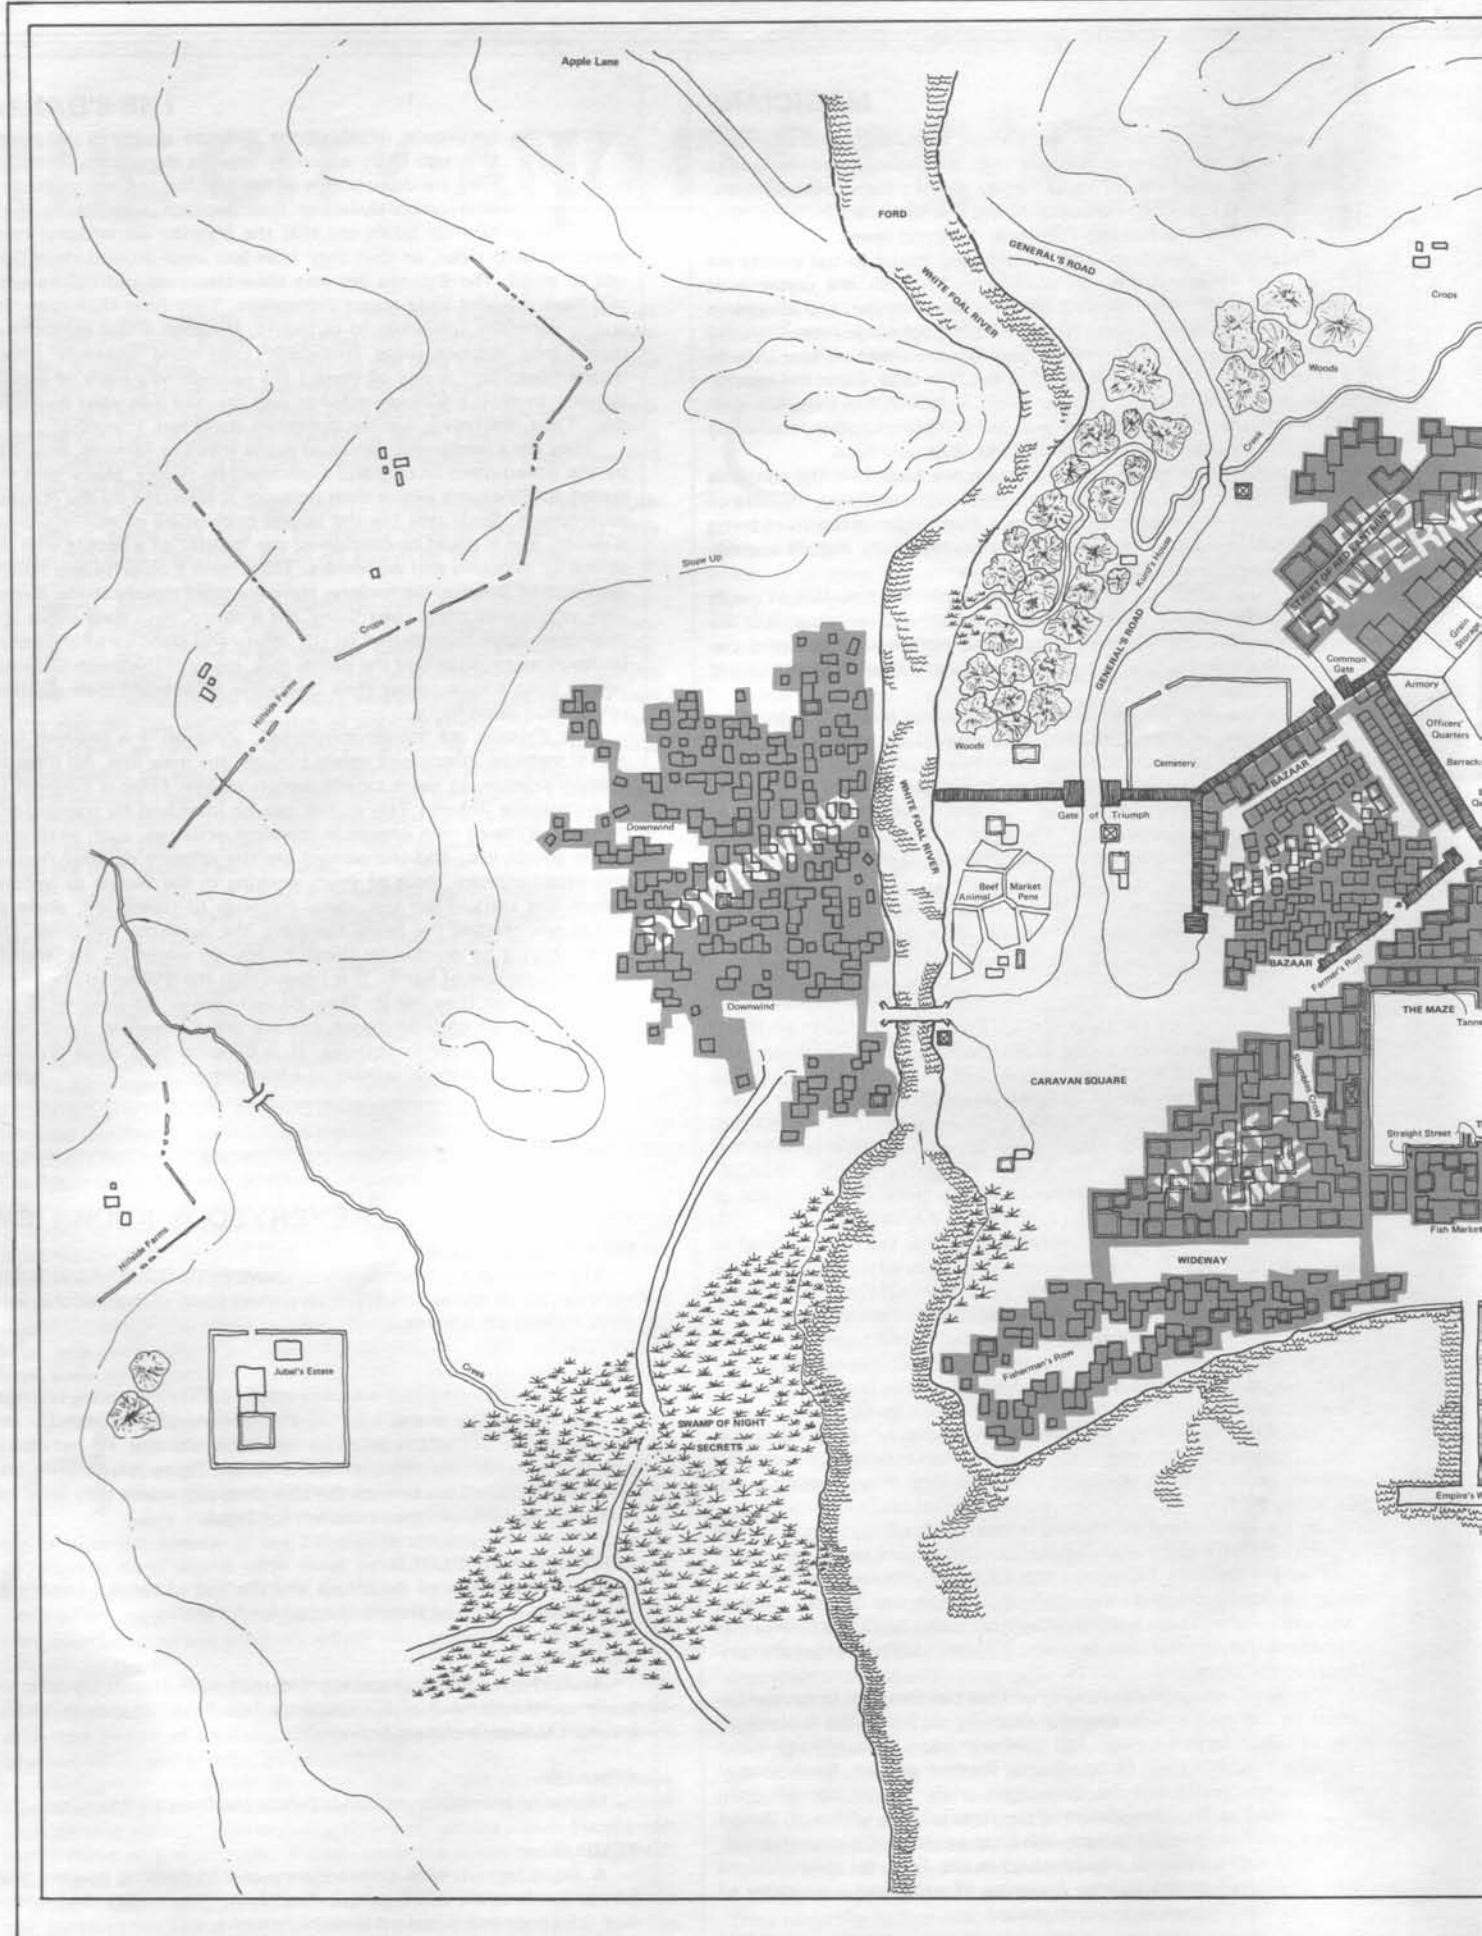

HONALD

TEMPUS

A living legend, with extraordinary and frightening powers. His reputation is wide. When people meet him, they realize that whatever tales they heard had underestimated him.

HAKIEM / THE HELL HOUNDS

Robert Asprin

Hakiem the Storyteller licked the dust from his lips as he squinted at the morning sun. It was going to be hot again today—a wine day, if he could afford wine. The little luxuries, like wine, that he allowed himself were harder to come by as the caravans became fewer and more infrequent.

His fingers idly seeking a sandflea which had successfully found its way inside his rags, he settled himself wearily in his new roost at the edge of the bazaar. Previously, he had frequented the large wharf until the fishermen drove him off, accusing him of stealing. Him! With all the thieves that abound in this town, they chose him for their accusations.

"Hakiem!"

He looked about him and saw a band of six urchins descending on him, their eyes bright and eager.

"Good morning, children," he grimaced, exposing his yellow teeth. "What do you wish of old Hakiem?"

"Tell us a story," they chorused, surging around him.

"Be off with you, sandfleas!" he moaned, waving an arm. "The sun will be hot today. I'll not add to the dryness of my throat telling you stories for free."

"Please, Hakiem?" one whined.

"We'll fetch you water," promised another.

"I have money."

The last offer caught at Hakiem's attention like a magnet. His eyes fastened hungrily on the copper coin extended in a grubby hand. That coin and four of its brothers would buy him a bottle of wine.

Where the boy had gotten it mattered not—he had probably stolen it. What concerned Hakiem was how to transfer the wealth from the boy to himself. He considered taking it by force, but decided against it. The bazaar was rapidly filling with people, and open bullying of children would doubtless draw repercussions. Besides, the nimble urchins could outrun him with ease. He would just have to earn it honestly. Disgusting, the depths to which he had sunk.

"Very well, Ran-tu," he smiled, extending his hand. "Give me the money, and you shall have any story you wish."

"After I hear the story," the boy announced haughtily. "You shall have the coin... if I feel the story is worth it. It is the custom."

"So it is," Hakiem forced a smile. "Come, sit here beside me so you can hear every detail."

The boy did as he was told, blissfully unaware that he was placing himself within Hakiem's long, quick reach.

"Now then, Ran-tu, what story do you wish to hear?"

"Tell us about the history of our city," the boy chirped, forgetting his pretended sophistication for the moment.

Hakiem grimaced, but the other boys jumped and clapped their hands with enthusiasm. Unlike Hakiem, they never tired of hearing this tale.

"Very well," Hakiem sighed. "Make room here!"

He shoved roughly at the forest of small legs before him, clearing a small space in the ground which he swept smooth with his hand. With quick, practiced strokes, he outlined the southern part of the continent and formed the north-south mountain range.

"The story begins here, in what once was the kingdom of IIsig, east of the Queen's Mountains."

"...which the Rankans call the World's End Mountains..." supplied an urchin.

"...and the Mountain Men call Gunderpah..." contributed another.

Hakiem leaned back on his haunches and scratched absently.

"Perhaps," he said, "the young gentlemen would like to tell the story while Hakiem listens."

"No they wouldn't," insisted Ran-tu. "Shut up, everyone. It's my story! Let Hakiem tell it."

Hakiem waited until silence was restored, then nodded loftily to Ran-tu and continued.

"Afraid of invasion from the then young Rankan Empire across the mountains, they formed an alliance with the Mountain Tribes to guard the only known pass through the mountains."

He paused to draw a line on his map indicating the pass.

"Lo, it came to pass that their fears were realized. The Rankans turned their armies toward IIsig, and they were forced to send their own troops into the pass to aid the Mountain Men in the kingdom's defense."

He looked up hopefully and extended a palm as a merchant paused to listen, but the man shook his head and moved on.

"While the armies were gone," he continued, scowling, "there was an uprising of slaves in IIsig. Body-servants, galley slaves, gladiators, all united in an effort to throw off the shackles of bondage. Alas..."

He paused and threw up his hands dramatically.

"...the armies of IIsig returned early from their mountain campaign and put a swift end to the uprising. The survivors fled south...here...along the coast."

He indicated the route with his fingers.

"The kingdom waited for a while, expecting the errant slaves to return of their own volition. When they didn't, a troop of cavalry was sent to overtake them and bring them back. They overtook the slaves here, forcing them back into the mountains, and a mighty battle ensued. The slaves were triumphant, and the cavalry was destroyed."

He indicated a point in the southern portion of the mountain range.

"Aren't you going to tell about the battle?" Ran-tu interrupted.

"That is a story in itself...requiring separate payment," Hakiem smiled.

The boy bit his lip and said nothing more.

CHRONOLOGY

Mary Beth Miller

In compiling this chronology I have considered the books Thieves' World and Tales from the Vulgar Unicorn to be historical artifacts, lively, month-to-month chronicles which span about a year and a half and which were written shortly after the events described. These accounts begin just after Prince Kadakithis comes to Sanctuary and end over a year later with the disappearance of Tempus. Included are many allusions both to prior local events and to known historical events. I have had to use and to extrapolate from these allusions in order to create a timeline for events which happened before the Prince's ascendance, since I lacked access to the historical chronicles of Mattathan and Venafer and to the Natural History of Khabayavesh. There are two time-frames. One is an approximate count of how many months or years ago each event happened, assuming the present to be around the time of Tempus' disappearance. The second assumes that Ranke imposed a new calendar on the populace which dates from the year in which Ranke conquered IIsig. All time before that is called Pre-Ranke (PR); all time since then is called Rankan Empire (RE).

How Long Ago	Rankan Event Calendar
time out of mind	legend	Sorcerer Hast-ra-kodi forges two suits of armor in the fire of a burning diamond.

"In the course of their battle with the cavalry, the slaves discovered a pass through the mountains, allowing them to enter this green valley, where game was plentiful and crops sprang from the ground. They called it Sanctuary."

"The valley isn't green," an urchin interrupted pointedly.

"That's because the slaves were dumb and overworked the land!" countered another.

"My dad used to be a farmer, and he didn't overwork the land!" argued a third.

"Then how is it you had to move into town when the sands took your farm?" countered the second.

"I want to hear my story!" barked Ran-tu, suddenly towering above them.

The group subsided into silence.

"The young gentleman there has the facts of the matter right," smiled Hakiem, pointing a finger at the second urchin. "But it took time. Oh my, yes, lots of time. As the slaves exhausted the land to the north, they moved south, until they reached the point where the town stands today. Here they met a group of native fishermen, and between fishing and farming managed to survive in peace and tranquility."

"That didn't last long," snorted Ran-tu, momentarily forgetting himself.

"No," agreed Hakiem. "The gods did not will it so. Rumors of a discovery of gold and silver reached the kingdom of Ilsig and brought intruders into our tranquility. First adventurers, and then a fleet from the kingdom itself came to capture the town and bring it under the kingdom's control. The only fly in the kingdom's victory wine that day was that most of the fishing fleet was out when they arrived, and, realizing the fate of the town, took refuge on Scavengers' Island to form the nucleus of the Cape Pirates, who harass ships to this day."

A fisherman's wife passed by and, glancing down, recognized the map in the dust, smiled, and tossed two copper coins to Hakiem. He caught them neatly, elbowing an urchin who tried to intercept them, and secreted them in his sash.

"Blessings on your house, mistress," he called after his benefactor.

"What about the empire?" Ran-tu prompted, afraid of losing his story.

"What? Oh, yes. It seems that one of the adventurers pushed north seeking the mythical gold, found a pass through the Civa, and eventually joined the Rankan Empire. Later, his grandson, now a general in the empire, found his ancestor's journals. He led a force south over his grandfather's old route and recaptured the town. Using it as a base, he launched a naval attack around the cape and finally captured the kingdom of Ilsig, making it a part of the empire forever."

"Which is where we are today," one of the urchins spat bitterly.

"Not quite," corrected Hakiem, his impatience to be done with the story yielding to his integrity as a tale-spinner. "Though the kingdom surrendered, for some reason the Mountain Men continued to resist the empire's attempts to use the Great Pass. That was when the caravan routes were established."

A faraway look came into his eyes.

"Those were the days of Sanctuary's greatness. Three or four caravans a week laden with treasures and trade goods. Not the miserable supply caravans you see today—great caravans that took half a day just to enter town."

"What happened?" asked one of the awestruck urchins.

Hakiem's eyes grew dark. He spat in the dust.

"Twenty years ago, the empire succeeded in putting down the Mountain Men. With the Great Pass open, there was no reason to risk major caravans in the bandit-ridden sands of the desert. Sanctuary has become a mockery of its past glory, a refuge for the scum who have nowhere else to go. Mark my words, one day the thieves will out-number the honest citizenry, and then . . ."

"One side, old man!"

A sandaled foot came down on the map, obliterating its outlines and scattering the urchins.

Hakiem cowered before the shadow of one of the Hell Hounds, the five new elite guards who had accompanied the new governor into town.

"Zalbar! Stop that!"

The unsmiling giant froze at the sound of the voice and turned to face the golden-haired youth who strode onto the scene.

"We're supposed to be governing these people, not bludgeoning them into submission."

It seemed strange, seeing a lad in his late teens chastising a scarred veteran of many campaigns, but the larger man merely dropped his eyes in discomfort.

"Apologies, Your Highness, but the Emperor said we were to bring law and order to this hell-hole, and it's the only language these blackguards understand."

"The Emperor—my brother—put me in command of this town to govern it as I see fit, and my orders are that the people are to be treated kindly as long as they do not break the laws."

"Yes, Your Highness."

The youth turned to Hakiem.

"I hope we did not disturb your story. Here—perhaps this will make up for our intrusion."

He pressed a gold coin into Hakiem's hand.

"Gold!" Hakiem sneered. "Do you think one miserable coin can make up for scaring those precious children?"

"What?" roared the Hell Hound. "Those gutter-rats? Take the Prince's money and be thankful I—"

"Zalbar!"

"But Your Highness, this man is only playing on your—"

"If he is, it's mine to give. . . ."

He pressed a few more coins into Hakiem's out-stretched hand.

"Now come along. I want to see the bazaar."

Hakiem bowed low, ignoring the Hell Hound's black glare. When he straightened, the urchins were clustered about him again.

"Was that the Prince?"

"My dad says he's the best thing for this town."

"My dad says he's too young to do a good job."

"Izzat so!"

"The Emperor sent him here to get him out of the way."

"Sez who?"

"Sez my brother! He's been bribing guards here all his life and never had any trouble till the Prince came. Him and his whores and his Hell Hounds."

"They're going to change everything. Ask Hakiem...Hakiem?"

The urchins turned to their chosen mentor, but Hakiem had long since departed with his new wealth for the cool depths of a tavern.

THE HELL HOUNDS

"As you already know, you five men have been chosen to remain with me here in Sanctuary after the balance of the honor guard returns to the capital."

Prince Kadakithis paused to look each man in the face before he continued. Zalbar, Bourne, Quag, Razkuli, and Arman. Each of them a seasoned veteran, they doubtless knew their work better than the Prince knew his. Kadakithis' royal upbringing came to his rescue, helping him to hide his nervousness as he met their gazes steadily.

"As soon as the ceremonies are completed tomorrow, I will be swamped with problems in clearing up the backlog of cases in the civil court. Realizing that, I thought it best to give you your briefing and assignments now, so that you will be able to proceed without the delay of waiting for specific instructions."

He beckoned the men forward, and they gathered around the map of Sanctuary hung on the wall.

"Zalbar and I have done some preliminary scouting of the town. Though this briefing should familiarize you with the basic lay of the land, you should each do your own exploring and report any new observations to each other. Zalbar?"

The tallest of the soldiers stepped forward and swept his hand across the map.

"The thieves of Sanctuary drift with wind like the garbage they are," he began.

"Zalbar!" the Prince admonished. "Just give the report without asides or opinions."

"Yes, Your Highness." The man replied bowing his head slightly. "But there is a pattern here which follows the winds from the east."

"The property values change because of the smells," Kadakithis reported. "You can say that without referring to the people as garbage. They are still citizens of the empire."

Zalbar nodded and turned to the map once more.

"The areas of least crime are here, along the eastern edge of town," he announced, gesturing. "These are the richest mansions, inns, and temples, which have their own defenses and safeguards. West of them, the town consists predominantly of craftsmen and skilled workers. The crime in this area rarely exceeds petty theft."

The man paused to glance at the prince before continuing.

"Once you cross the Processional, however, things get steadily worse. The merchants vie with each other as to who will carry the widest selection of stolen or illicit goods. Much of their merchandise is supplied by smugglers who openly use the wharves to unload their ships. What is not purchased by the merchants is sold directly at the bazaar."

Zalbar's expression hardened noticeably as he indicated the next area.

"Here is a tangle of streets known simply as the Maze. It is acknowledged by all to be the roughest section of town. Murder and armed robbery are commonplace occurrences day or night in the Maze, and most honest citizens are afraid to set foot there without an armed escort. It has been brought to our attention that none of the guardsmen in the local garrison will enter this area, though whether this is out of fear or if they have been bribed..."

The prince cleared his throat noisily. Zalbar grimaced and moved on to another area.

"Outside the walls to the north of town is a cluster of brothels and gaming houses. There are few crimes reported in this area, though we believe this is due more to a reluctance on the part of the inhabitants to deal with authorities than from any lack of criminal activity. To the far west of town is a shantytown inhabited by beggars and derelicts known as the Downwinders. Of all the citizens we've encountered so far, they seem the most harmless."

His report complete, Zalbar returned to his place with the others as the prince addressed them once again.

"Your priorities until new orders are issued will be as follows," he announced, eyeing the men carefully. "First, you are to make a concentrated effort to reduce or eliminate petty crime on the east side of town. Second, you will close the wharves to the smuggler traffic. When that is done, I will sign into law certain regulations enabling you to move against the brothels. By that time my court duties should have eased to a point where we can formulate a specific plan of action for dealing with the Maze. Any questions?"

"Are you anticipating any problems with the local priesthood over the ordered construction of new temples to Savankala, Sabellia, and Vashanka?" Bourne asked.

"Yes, I am," the prince acknowledged. "But the difficulties will probably be more diplomatic than criminal in nature. As such, I will attend to it personally, leaving you free to pursue your given assignments."

There were no further questions, and the prince steeled himself for his final pronouncement.

"As to how you are to conduct yourselves while carrying out your orders" . . . Kadakithis paused dramatically while sweeping the assemblage with a hard glare. "I know you men are all soldiers and used to meeting opposition with bared steel. You are certainly permitted to fight to defend yourselves if attacked or to defend any citizen of this town. However, I will not tolerate brutality or needless bloodshed in the name of the empire. Whatever your personal feelings may be, you are not to draw a sword on any citizen unless they have proven—I repeat, proven—themselves to be criminal. The townsfolk have already taken to calling you Hell Hounds. Be sure that title refers only to the vigor with which you pursue your duties and not to your viciousness. That is all."

There were mutters and dark glances as the men filed out of the room. While the Hell Hounds' loyalty to the empire was above question, Kadakithis had pause to wonder if in their own minds they truly considered him a representative of that empire.

Zhanuvend—a good, and expensive, red wine. (ZAN-oo-vend)

OATHS

Mary Beth Miller

Various trades and nationalities have their own tutelary and national gods. Oaths in Sanctuary are usually sworn on one's own gods or goddesses: thieves tend to swear on Shalpa, prostitutes on Shipri or Eshi, soldiers on Vashanka or the old battle-gods Calisard and Vortheld, Cirdonians on Heqt, and Ilsi on the Ilsi pantheon. Oaths range from a sadly murmured "Sabellia, Sabellia" to a fierce "By all the hells of all the cults!" A sample of representative oaths follows.

"O kindly gods of Caronel!"

"I swear by Eshi!"

"By the thousand eyes!"

"O Sabellia!"

"Ils of the thousand eyes!"

"By Shipri the All-Mother!"

"By the nine hundred and ninth eye of Ilsi!"

"Damnation of Vashanka!"

"By the paps of Shipri, Mother!"

"For the sake of Igill!"

"By Wishvu's whiskers!"

"Oh, Igill!"

"Thanks be to Klaoshna!"

"By Savankala and the son!"

"Heqt's face!"

"By Ilsi and his sisters!"

"By Calisard, Vortheld, and the sand gods of long dead soldiers!"

"Name of Tiana Savior!"

The Gods of Thieves' World

Andrew Offutt

[Document expropriated from a Temple courier (who escaped)]

The Old Kingdom was called Iisig, which meant simply "the children of Iis." Iis was their founding god, though they were neither stupid nor arrogant enough to call him the Only God. Former slaves of Iisig, freed by their own hands, founded the settlement they called Sanctuary. With them those hardy folk brought their beliefs, and the gods of Iisig flourished in the new land. So did the people, and Sanctuary grew.

The town's first great structure was to Iis. Just what eventually displeased him none was sure, though naturally there was much opining and ranting accusations; speakers for gods ever seek power. Sanctuary became a city—and sank with the drying up of the caravan route, because of those arrogant conqueror-folk from Ranke. Only then did it come to be called by the dishonorable appellation of Thieves' World.

Before Time was, Iis was, and is.

Lord of Lords he is, and Lord of a Thousand Eyes. Those Eyes of Iis are the dreadsome Sikkintair, those creatures Blessed Kharin dubbed the "Flying Knives." They watch over all for the Lord of Lords, and report to Him on swift wings. Only in the presence of Iis do the sikkintair have power of speech—or perhaps only He can understand them. Yet again perhaps it is that the high-flyers deign to speak only to the Lord of All Lords.

Iis is a passionate and jealous god, and was more jealous and passionate still in His youth. From His sixth fingers He created all the earth and from his sixth toes the other gods. At last, from His own bodily wastes, He created humans to people His lands.

Time came when the first-created of the gods, stormy Gundr, challenged the power of Iis. Gundr lost the struggle. He was hurled to earth, for Iis is a jealous god. There the rebel remains, aspiring still to the sky wherein lives Iis. The fallen deity is now god of the Mountain Men, who call their craggy land Gunderpah. Now and again some claim to have seen the footprints of mighty Gundr in the snows of the high passes.

Iis spared Gundr's thrice-fair daughter, Shipri. Iis is a passionate god; He spared her and couched her. Of that couching came issue and in time He rewarded her laments by making her Consort. Shipri is patron of all mothers, with special feeling for those forced into motherhood out of wedlock. She is called All-mother, and shown in gowns of sky-blue and sunset pink, and worshiped by women and men alike. Her kindly nature tempers the passions and jealousy of Iis—usually.

Their temple is one. It rises high and gilded of dome in Sanctuary, sky-aspiring above all other buildings there.

Of Iis Shipri brought forth Shils, and Anen, and then Thufir, and the twins Shalpa and Eshi, a daughter. Years later she bore again, this time Him We Speak Not Of, god of weapons and their use. Anen is called firstborn, for Shils called Bastard was slain in the one sin of Iis, for He is a jealous god and Shils much, much resembled Gundr.

Anen Firstborn proved hard to manage and is patron of taverns and those bibbers who frequent them. Brewers and winemakers pray to Anen and for him is always poured the first bottle. Unwise drinkers are wont to call his name on the Morning After. A joke common in Sanctuary is that Anen has more temples than any—save possibly Eshi goddess of Love, since even Sanctuary boasts more couches and beds than taverns and bars.

It was Thufir who pleased Iis most, surely not only because he is a homely god.

Almost from birth Thufir was fascinated by the sikkintair. As he grew, his fascination became fondness. The Flying Knives appreciated this, as they are hardly the sort of creature to elicit fondness and indeed are the patrons of critics. The sikkintair bore Thufir on their long narrow backs across the vault of heaven and down to the earth, and they taught him the far-seeing. Thus did he become Thufir of the Eagle Eyes, protector of those pilgrims who founded our beloved Sanctuary.

He is well loved, patron of sight and seers and swiftness. Too he is Guardian of Travelers. Surely no door in Sanctuary is bare of the Sign of Thufir: a sandal tacked above the lintel. The Rankans in their arrogance find it hard to understand how a lowly slave-sandal came to be a symbol of him called Eagle-eyed. They are weaponeers, not thinkers, those Rankans.

Consort to Thufir is Thilli the Slim, of whom Iis said that she resembled a non-flying knife. Thilli is patron of dyestuffs and fabrics, of hairdressers and the storm-caught, and warder against diseases of the heart and limbs. Each time her glorious hair requires cutting, a pale and lovely new cloud appears in the sky. The dual temple of Thufir-Thilli is second in Sanctuary only to that of Iis-Shipri. A great yellow eagle's eye gazes down from its dome and a golden sandal hangs above its every sandal-shaped door. None need ask what miniature is worn around the necks of the special devotees of Thufir! And the brightness of the attire on Cloud-day is a sight to behold.

Eshi is prayed to and much spoken of, but little revered. That she had her way with all her brothers, and sought even to couch her father, everyone knows. She loves jewellery and lovers. Cows are blessed by Eshi, and cats, and her sign is the liver, which any child knows is the seat of love and infatuation. She wed Him We Speak Not Of, and distracts his dark mind from thoughts of war, for all know we of Sanctuary are a peaceful folk.

Shalpa bested all his siblings in the Great Race of the Gods. Once too he outran a thought of his mother so that he intercepted it before it reached her brain. Thus he avoided punishment for—never mind. Hence he is Shalpa the Swift. Yet he is also He To Whom There Is No Temple, and The Shadowed One and the Swift-fingered One, as well as the Swift-footed One, in his night-dark cloak. (Indeed, it is just that. Once there was an extra day on the earth, for so it pleased Iis. But Shalpa appropriated the daytime of it for his beloved, Nirpsa goddess of Sorcery, for a crown; and he took to himself the night to wear as cloak. Hence the year is never quite long enough, as any can see.)

Shalpa's name is seldom spoke, for he is patron of thieves as well as athletes. Among the former the phrase "May the night-dark cloak cover you and your actions this night" is often heard—quietly said. The meaning is simple: "Good luck with tonight's thieving."

Weapons are made and war loved by Him We Speak Not Of, and we shall not speak of him here.

These are the gods that have long presided over Thieves' World. None is pleased by the advent of Ranke and its swinish gods: Savakala and his spouse Sabellia, Lady of Stars and the Sharp-Tongued One; and their venal son Vashanka, the Tenslayer, patron of weapons (much honored, naturally, by those—by Rankans) and his consort Azyuna. (His sister! His ten other siblings he slew to save his parents from their rebellion.) Thunder of course they say is Savakala's anger at interfering clouds—Up Thilli!—while lightning they think is Vashanka, practicing at arms so that godly sparks are struck across the sky. It is probably so, but this writer has no more to say of the dark gods of those arrogant Rankans. Let cess fill their temples and serpents entwine their statuary.

This second Thieves' World book is intended only for gamemasters. While the player's guide supplies background information, that information may be incorrect or incomplete, even though 'everybody' knows that it is true. Players should not enter a Thieves' World campaign with information superior to that which could be gathered by a few days' visit and much talk. But gamemasters need to know much more, and the second and third books in this set (as well as the two smaller separate maps) include material not only intended to ease the gamemaster's task—it also will give him or her accurate information logically and consistently presented, some of which (such as in Petrue's letter) will contradict conventional wisdom.

ESSAYS

The Essays section of this book gives the gamemaster the true story of Sanctuary. It includes instructions on the use of the book, a picture of the power relationships in Sanctuary, a better idea of the real demography of Sanctuary and a closer look at the true relationships of the gods of Sanctuary.

I. HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Greg Stafford

City Scenarios

The use of cities in a role-playing game are many. Cities are places in which to buy, sell, hire, spend, steal, visit, and live. Game cities can be as complex as real cities, and can be put to as many uses.

City life itself is sufficient source of adventure without ever wandering into the abysmally natural wilds. Especially the city of Sanctuary, which was created expressly to house excitement!

This book is the gamemaster's key to Sanctuary. With it, he can guide and play an exciting adventure or an everyday event, either pre-planned or spontaneously. This book provides background scenery, ideas, and motives to bring the teeming city to life, and is intended to be a primary tool in creating an enjoyable play experience.

This Guide outlines a variety of possible activities and experiences within a realistic framework, and great care has been taken to make sure that the experiences on the charts are appropriate to the city of Sanctuary. The Guide provides a familiar setting enhancing play without forcing the referee to narrate everything.

Realistic city life requires realism by the players as well. They should be reminded that Sanctuary is a civilized place with laws, and that the authorities have martial and magical power to back up their word. Players should act according to their characters, of course, but should be prepared to see what that is like among "normal everyday people."

A scenario or session of city role-playing is usually quite different from a 'hack & slash' adventure. On the latter type the characters use survival and combat skills against a hostile environment. Such skills are quite unsuitable to a city which is not innately hostile to characters. Other skills must be used and developed for city adventuring.

City adventures require more role-playing than game-playing. Social interaction is both the vehicle and object of such games. Player characters should be tested by several different pressures, whether by a surly, stupid drunk or by some nobleman's innuendo about virility.

If players question how their characters managed to spend so much time in the city previously (in between-game time) without having suffered nearly the number of mishaps that occur in these city scenarios, the referee should remind them that everyone has bad days, and that this is one of those bad days, and that the players have been invited to oversee their characters' ill luck and to guide them through it. If players persist, then the gamemaster should cast mysterious sidelong glances and state, in a low voice, that there is, indeed, something unusual going on here if the characters can only figure it out. If the players still persist on prying into the comparative realism of such days, then the referee should pack up and let the players run the game.

A city provides its own adventures. Everyday scenes can be changed into critical adventures. However, the characters have their choice of participating or not. If they see an old friend of theirs on the gibbet about to be hung they can choose to intervene or not. They may watch silently or pass on instead. Goody-goody types may want to intervene when they see some innocent idiot cheated by his employer. That's fun to role-play.

City play requires preparation and some gamemaster skills at presentation. It may seem an imposing task to represent yourself as 20,000 different people. It is! With care taken beforehand the task is easier, and with experience will come increased skill.

Before-Game Preparations

Sessions may be planned or spontaneous. If possible we suggest that the referee know the intentions of the player characters before the session begins. If the players want to try to sell a magical sword in all of the weaponshops in the city, then it is useful for the referee to have the weaponshops located and populated beforehand. He will have had time to figure out the attitudes and offers of the various shopkeepers as well, and thereby give some real attention to playing the NPC's rather than making them up on the spot. If the characters decide it is hot, and want to stop off for a brew at some tavern, then there will still be some creative improvisation for the gamemaster.

If characters are simply wandering through the town (such activity is excellent scenario material), then this, too, should be known and pre-planned.

It is suggested that you pre-roll encounters, especially the first few times that you use the book. As you read it you will probably want to make a few dry solo runs yourself. It is not necessary to actually engage in any activity, either on a solo or group run. If you do so, then it is useful to keep notes afterwards. You will develop a quick abbreviation style. These solo passages will yield possible emergency filler material later on when you need some.

By preparing the encounters beforehand the referee will have had time and reason to think about the attitudes of the people encountered. He can use these and develop activities from them.

When preparing the rolls I suggest that you roll up a whole list of percentages first, then go through the book and use them as you go. If you come across anything of particular interest to the characters, note it and proceed on.

It is helpful to have several types of encounters prepared beforehand as well. That way you can always pull out the Minor Streets Processional set of encounters when the characters do something unexpected, and take off down a side street.

Always be prepared to cope with spontaneity from the players or the NPCs controlled by you. This is the stuff of adventure, and it is what the referee should build toward. Giving background, thought, and freedom to the players within the limited control of the gamemaster allows the game to live its own life.

Gamemastering

No amount of pre-rolled encounters ensure a good game. The referee must translate raw game numbers and the simple descriptive phrases which we provided into the scenes for adventure. Three problems confront the referee: background, presentation, and spontaneity. Coping with these will always be aided by preparations beyond those of simply rolling up encounter after encounter.

Background

Background research is critical. Unless there is a clear idea of the milieu of play, there will be an empty ring to the proceedings. How could anyone play without knowing if they are in a large city or small town or wilderness camp, or if the natives prefer (or hate) to eat barleycakes or brontoburgers? The Player's Guide mitigates this problem.

The anthologies themselves provide other primary research material. We cannot stress too much that reading them will greatly ease any referee problem.

Further ideas concerning motives and lives of the background populations should be sought. Any library or book-store will provide general reading about Arabs or Mongols, who are comparable to the Raggah. We usually treat the mountain barbarians like European barbarians, with a preference for Celts or Scots. The citified IIsigs and Rankans resemble Greeks or Romans.

Scrutinize the rejects who populate the Maze. Such scoundrels include the lowest and meanest, and the toughest and the wildest. These desperados are more interested in their own welfare than that of anyone or anything else. They are (often loudly) defiant of all law and authority. They may be completely amoral or may have perverse views or morality cut to suit their own purposes. As a class they are unfeeling, with little or no respect for the sanctity of life. There are no handy books about such types, but referees have a better source of study at hand: the common adventurer! Rootless, careless of life, selfish and self-motivated, the common player character will find himself quite at home in the dark jungle of the Maze.

Everyday experience will provide further information. Think about applying events you experienced that day into a game situation. Jaywalking might start the adventure when characters get run down by horsemen. Buying lunch from a vendor might spark clues to excitement. There might be a sale on something a character wishes to purchase, but doesn't quite have the money for...

If you can't make up a plot line for the session, then transfer a story you read elsewhere into Sanctuary. Make the main character of the other story into a Sanctuary character, either new or drawn from the list we provide, and have him ask the player character for help or information. He may wish them to steal something from a temple, to shrink down to rat size to investigate a rumored invasion by the vermin, or to hunt alligators in the sewers.

Individual NPCs can be personalized by transferring some quirk or behavior to them from a story or movie you saw. The players will never realize, nor need to know, that your innkeeper acts like the pawnbroker in The Pawnbroker, or that the watch captain acts like your version of Dick Tracy, or that the beggar is actually Thomas Covenant! The referee then has the private glee of knowing that his own sub-creation has succeeded and is participating in the play.

It is not necessary for the referee to remember everything all the time. Literacy has solved that dilemma, if you provide you own pencil and write in the book. Jot down a key phrase or event to remind you of the salient points of the individual or the place.

Presentation

Scenario presentation may be divided into two parts: information and drama. Information presentation is what the gamemaster provides, dramatic presentation is how he provides it.

Information includes all data. This includes background sensory input, statistics, general impressions, and facts the characters already know but which the players do not. The data may be generalized, such as the crowd density or the weather, or specific, such as telling how a barbarian's medallion is especially rich and ornate and that his cloak is shabby. Some information is casual, such as the observation that the streets are dusty from morning to nightfall, and some is critical, like noting that the inn fell completely silent when the characters entered.

An excellent rule to remember in bringing a scene to life is to use several different senses in an impression. Sights and sounds are usually described, but if you sneak in references to smells, textures, and tastes, then the play takes on new life and subtlety.

Referees should also remember to relate the reactions of the NPCs. Streets, especially, are full of people who are curious, scared, or angry almost by whim. Referees must tread a fine line by telling players if their characters' actions are inappropriate, yet still allowing the characters to act that way if they want. (Referees have a further responsibility to ensure the rest of the environment reacts appropriately to the characters' inappropriateness!) A mob must be allowed to act naturally and independently of either gamemaster or player desires. This creates a tension of play which aids the suspension of disbelief and enhances the role-playing fantasy.

Dramatic presentation is a communication skill which is related to oral traditions. It must be attempted and experienced to be improved. All of the better referees I know or know of are skilled at this.

Good dramatic presentation transfers information to the players in a manner which will engage their interest and curiosity, yet allow them to contribute.

There are no secrets in this. There are some techniques that are useful and instructive.

First of all, when delivering parts of the scenario always begin with broad generalizations and gradually reveal more and more information as the characters discover it. Let them draw conclusions and narrow down the problem, whether it is how to steal something or how to learn something or how to find something, towards its climax. If the hints and clues you gave are integral or decisive to the culminating action, then there has been clear continuity to the game, binding it together during play and when recalled afterwards.

Integrate the game mechanics from your system into the play. I am most familiar with RQ and so use that as an example: I have the players occasionally check appropriate skill rolls at casual intervals to begin with. These are usually non-critical events. When I wish the action to be tense I will have the characters checking their survival skills often, and also throwing in other skills which may or may not be useful. Just making the rolls adds to the tension and drama of the game.

When checking these things the players and characters are both engaged and intent. Both the timing of the rolls and the types of rolls made are instrumental in helping to dramatize the parts of the game.

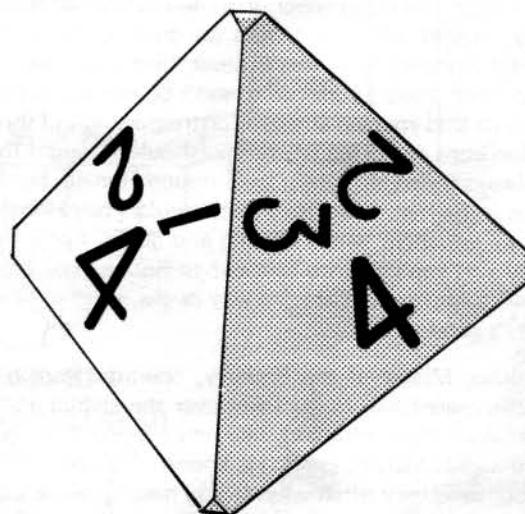

Body language is also useful. The gamemaster can use it to clarify and intensify a situation. Background information and simple investigation can be handled with casual and almost chatty relaxation. But if the referee is leaning, elbows on the table, and peering intently into the players' eyes, then the scene takes on a whole new meaning. Mysterious, sidelong glances at special times also alter the perception of the game.

These hints are intended to bring a closer interaction between the referee, players, characters, and environment. It is useful to think about these things and plan a bit beforehand. Gamemastering may be clumsy or embarrassing at first, but beginning referees should be heartened to know that practice always brings improvement and always makes the next game easier.

Spontaneity

Spontaneity is always difficult and it or its lack can make or break a game. Referees should always be ready to have their best-laid plans destroyed by a single bright idea. They (as well as the players) should be ready to turn from prepared paths and onto the rooftops of adventure, for players' characters have a knack for taking their own ideas seriously and acting on them no matter what the referee may think.

When reacting, the referee still should maintain some control. If caught quite off guard he can always throw up natural hindrances to slow play enough to let him get his breath. A referee should always be ready to stop play for a moment or two to think something through. It is always easy to give into the players' ideas out of frustration or anxiety, but referees should resist since it becomes impossible to keep track of what is happening, or where this might end. Players should also be willing to compromise in favor of a good game and bypass one or more of their bright ideas if it makes the referee's job too complex. Cooperation is the key to any RPG; lack of it is the bane of all role-playing.

PALM-GREASING AT THE PALACE

Lynn Abbey

So, kid, you want a favor? Need something done or undone? Got a little deal simmering that should have a bit of legal icing on it? You think it's time to go to the Palace and see Prince Kadakithis. He'd like to think he's accessible to every palms-up beggar that gets to the gate of that Ilsigian white-elephant he lives in. He says the nobility has an obligation to the people. He's a little naive, you know. He's got a cordon of officials and bureaucrats (especially selected by his half-brother the Emperor) who keep things under proper control, but, kid, even they don't control as much of the Palace as they think they do.

You see, the Palace had been here since old Ilsap XVI thought there was gold in the swamp and figured Sanctuary was going to be the new Kingdom capital. When the gold didn't pan out and the town fell on worse times, the Palace had the only roof that didn't leak. The families that moved into the Palace then haven't budged since. They certainly aren't going to let some nasal tourists from Ranke interfere with their little sinecures. The native-born hierarchy in the Palace is base-born and unwashed. It probably can't do a thing to help you, really, but it can keep you from seeing the people you do want to see and in practical terms that's all the power they need.

To get anywhere in the Palace you're going to have to get past Honald the Gatekeeper or some member of his sprawling family, one of whom is always on duty at the outer doors. Without Honald's help you'll never find your way along the corridors of power; your name won't be entered in the register and you'll find yourself arrested for trespassing and thrown into the dungeons for being where you shouldn't ought to be. You can always try to bluff your way around Honald, but it's safest just to bribe him. Even the Palace regulars pay Honald and his crew to tell them who's coming and going. For a little more money you can convince him not to notice your movements. Honald doesn't much care one way or the other so long as your money's good.

Stilcho, Master of the Equerry, operates from a different sort of power-base. He watches over the stables and the out-buildings of the compound, like he's supposed to, but he also runs the Palace spy-network. He knows who's going to do what to whom and very often why. If you need to see a specific person, and see him quickly, bribe Stilcho and he'll put you on a collision course with him. If you're waiting for action, bribe Stilcho and he'll shake the apples out of the tree. If you've got enemies, bribe Stilcho and he'll tell you what they're up to; while you're at it, though, better bribe him again and maybe he won't tell them what you're up to.

Maybe you simply want to turn an honest trade at the Palace; maybe you like uniforms and need a job; maybe your lady-love's one of the Prince's neglected concubines; maybe all else has failed but you've still got to see someone. If this is the case, sooner or later your footsteps will take you to Major-domo Lu-Broca who tends the household treasury and disciplines the household troops. Larceny rather than blood is said to run in his veins, though he runs most of the Palace on the up-and-up to avoid suspicion. He can hide you in the bedchamber of your choice or even back your latest business venture out of household petty-cash—if there's something in it for him. He's said to be one of the richest men in town, so the bribe is just to keep you honest. He's got keys to dungeon cells that the Rankan imports don't know exist, so it's a good idea to play by his rules when you play with Lu-Broca.

Lu-Broca is the last of the least in the Palace. Above him in the power pyramid are all the Prince's men and women. Altogether there are about forty titled Rankans in the palace, exclusive of minor children and personal servants. Of course Ranke decrees a married man works harder for the Empire, so there are very few bachelors in this part of the Palace and a lot of bored husbands and wives. A Rankan title denotes respectability and responsibility. It might be that any diplomat's name along with his personal seal will solve your problems, but assuming you've got a real reason to be in the Palace then you'll want to deal with real power and that will mean getting the Prince's seal on your documents, or at least the impression of one of the three legal copies.

The first copy of the seal, carved from a block of sunset-pink jade, is always in the possession of Coricidius, the Prince's vizier. Coricidius is the oldest member of the Rankan entourage. He was sent here after a scandalous affair in the capital. He knows he's going to die and rot in Sanctuary and he hates the place with a passion that adds extra furrows to his brow and draws his lips into a permanent sneer. His official duties include clearing all foreigners at the court and approving what limited official trade Sanctuary has with other parts of the Empire. He would like to see the swamp engulf the entire town but in lieu of that he'll be content to squeeze the last possible penny out of his official tasks. No caravan enters or leaves the town without having Coricidius' seal on its articles-of-trade and his agents are forever combing the shops and bazaar stalls looking for items which have escaped his tariffs.

Rost-Revenant, the Emperor's Adjudicator in Sanctuary, possessor of the amber seal, is a truly busy man. His court opens one hour after sunrise and is often in session until mid-afternoon when Revenant must attend the hangings, dismemberings, blindings and enslavements he has decreed and attest that proper punishment has been handed down. He takes his job seriously, but the sheer magnitude of his task means that there are slip-ups and miscarriages of justice. Though he is not often susceptible to bribes, his clerks, scribes and assistants are. Revenant also has the keys to the Prince's warehouses wherein are stores, confiscated property and evidence in pending trials. Those keys are at least as valuable as his seal, for a case cannot be concluded if the evidence disappears.

Sanctuary's tax-collector, Terryle, Chamberlain and Keeper of the Privy Purse, possesses the third seal, carved from a unicorn horn. He is beloved of none and maligned by all, especially in a currency-poor town like Sanctuary. He's survived at least half dozen attempts on his life so far and some of the greater merchants are getting the idea that it's easier to do business his way rather than pay for another failed assassination attempt. Every business must have a charter from Terryle. Every exchange of land must be registered with him for a price. Every manumission, enlistment, immigration or emmigration has its fee as does every birth, death or marriage. Obviously Terryle only collects a small fraction of what he's owed, but he's mostly interested in keeping you just a little bit in debt to the government. His corps of legmen stand ready to show your every fiscal indiscretion when you come to the Palace asking for a favor; and to get anything from the Palace you must be a citizen, and to be a citizen your taxes must be in order. Usually if you approach Terryle first and tell him what's on your mind, he'll tell you how much it will cost to clean up your tax record.

What? You still want to see the Prince? You've paid your way into the Palace; you've cleaned yourself at the Rankan money-grubbers and now you want to see the Prince? This is a problem. I'd hoped you'd have come to your senses by now. The Prince doesn't see anybody except by accident, my friend! We can't have all that sweetness and enlightenment dribbling down onto the machinery of state, can we? But if you must see the Prince you'll have to bribe Honald to get into the palace to see Stilcho. You'll have to bribe Stilcho to find out what the Prince is going to be doing for the next few days. Then bribe Lu-Broca to slip you into the appropriate room; bribe Terryle to clear your name on the tax-scrolls; bribe one of Rost-Revenant's scribes to write your petition up for you and then you just might be able to give your parchment to the Prince, though what he'll do with it is the god's guess. He might spend the next three months seeking the "justice" of your case. He might send you back to someone you've already bribed and he might make up his unchangeable mind on the spot, much more influenced by what he had for breakfast than by the merits of your argument.

III.

GETTING BUSTED IN SANCTUARY

When the newcomer to Sanctuary has finally adjusted to the wide-open anarchy of the town he is apt to come upon the most startling discovery of all—there's a lot of law in our little town and it can be very efficient. A town like Sanctuary requires an extensive legal network in order to maintain any sort of stability or the entire population of the town would have been killed off long before the Rankans showed up.

Justice, and its enforcement, is tripartite. The most noticeable justice is Rankan Civil Justice and the most noticeable enforcers are the Hell-Hounds and the Imperial Garrison of Sanctuary. The least noticeable form of justice is the ad-hoc justice of the streets which is administered and enforced by Sanctuary's under-class of survivors.

Lynn Abbey

Mid-way between these two is the canon-law of the various cults in town. Canon-law is presumed to be divinely inspired and is, therefore, the least logical of the three. By and large, all three systems are putative rather than rehabilitative and the right of appeal is forbidden by all three. Their jurisdictions habitually overlap and if you've got the feeling that your goose is about to be cooked, the choice of chef could be vitally important to you.

The Civil Law of the Rankan Empire covers crimes against property and person. Monetary restitution of some sort to the wronged party is customary. Punishment of the guilty is swift, harsh and meted out in accordance with the offender's status in life. Imprisonment, per se, is not a punishment.

A suit is brought into Rankan justice either by its discovery by an authorized agent of the Rankan law, i.e. the Hell Hounds, or by the complaint of a citizen of the Empire. Crimes against slaves, incidentally, are crimes against property not person, and the suit must be brought by the owner of the slave. Rankan law recognizes the legal rights of a woman to control and defend her own property. However, exercising those legal rights may be difficult.

Petty crimes such as shop-lifting, purse-snatching, simple thievery and bodily assault not resulting in death or permanent injury are tried in the morning assizes of the Captain of the Day at the Sanctuary Garrison. Aye-Gophan, Walegrin or their peers see to the justice of each case and the administration of punishments not in excess of the removal of three fingers on each hand.

Obviously the larger merchants are plagued by larceny on a grander scale: fraud, embezzlement and the crimes of which the better-off are particularly heir. As the Rankan Empire is in many ways a trade federation, the rights of merchants are scrupulously observed. They control the Magisterial Courts of Sanctuary which are presided over by a panel of three merchants chosen by legitimate guild members and who serve a specific term of office. Bribery is an accepted part of the game in the magisterial courts. There is no limit to the property value of suits brought before the magistrates and the ultimate punishment rendered, beyond full restitution, is loss of limb and/or enslavement. However, bodily crimes are not normally tried here. Exceptions have occurred as when the wife of Halle the armorer claimed Halle was a part of his own property and successfully brought his murderer before the magistrates, one of whom was her brother-in-law. The offender, the son of a priest of Savankala, was blinded and enslaved on the spot and lost in the Swamp of Night Secrets that very evening.

High crimes and crimes against the nobility of the Empire are tried by the Prince's own Court which is presided over by Rost-Revenant who has one of the three legitimate copies of the Prince's seal (his is amber and the impression shows an extra line under the Prince's name.) There is no limit to the justice of the Prince's court; it can exonerate or execute without offering cause for its actions. In practice, since the arrival of Kadakithis his court has the reputation of being thorough and fair. It is also the only court that can hear suits against the other enforcers and administrators of Rankan Law.

Recently the Prince himself heard the suit of a man accused of murdering the suitor of his daughter. The Prince examined all the witnesses personally and concluded that the young man had indeed intended to turn his new wife over to the madam of the Lily Garden to pay off his debts at the house. He thus exonerated the young girl's father. He also fined the Lily Garden the exact amount of the young man's debt for failing to observe his prohibition of credit at the town's brothels.

For the innocent the best place to be is the Rankan Civil Courts where the cause of justice is occasionally served. Of course, not everyone has access to Civil Law. There are well-known and respected citizens of Sanctuary who could not show their face in a Civil Court without having certain crimes of their own brought to light. The City's unaffiliated sorcerers and magicians usually mete out their own justice and police their own community after their own lights. In most cases, however, a magician would be impervious to the justice of the Civil Courts anyway.

Permanent residents of the bazaar, usually acting within the bounds of the S'danzo blood-justice concepts, also avenge their own successfully and are traditionally difficult to bring before any of the other courts and authorities in town.

In the Downwind section of town, Jubal, the ex-gladiator, runs a parody of the prince's court and though far less thorough and infinitely more corrupt and capricious, he has the trust of much of that part of the population which wouldn't trust legitimate authority on a bet. Until the arrival of the Hell-Hounds his blue-masked swordsmen were the most visible deterrent to random mayhem Sanctuary possessed.

And, of course, in the Maze after sundown (where life is nasty, brutish and short) might makes right and the devil take the hindmost.

The canonical courts of the various temples in Sanctuary offer a completely independent justice which is often at odds with Civil Justice. In the capital, canon law is strictly regulated by the civil authorities, but in an outpost like Sanctuary, where the gods are at war as well, the priests and their courts have considerably more power. To delve into the customs of every sect would be needlessly time consuming; a few general rules should apply to most cases. Any crime, except a capital crime against a citizen, committed by an initiate of a priestly order is in the jurisdiction of that order, and likewise any crime committed on temple property, except capital crimes as described above, is the jurisdiction of that temple's justice. In practice, as there is bickering among the gods, there is bickering among the temples and the temples try to keep the activities of their courts secret. However, according to Rankan law, it is the privilege of the priests of the state cult to try all religious crimes brought to their attention.

With the arrival of Molin Torchholder and the revitalization of the Rankan state cult, most canon law is now the law of Savankala, Sabellia and Vashanka. This justice is mandated by Molin but in practice it is handed to him by three anonymous inquisitors: Rashan, the Eye of Savankala; Medes, the Fist of Vashanka; and Corellia, the Heart of Sabellia, and the only one of the three normally represented by a woman. The inquisitors can recommend any punishment, but the execution of a death sentence or enslavement is supposed to be carried out by the civil authorities who are bound by the cults' dicta. In practice the cults rarely use the strengths of civil justice and stories of "voluntary" sacrifices are probably true.

There is one unique aspect to canon law worth mentioning here. While the right to appeal does not exist, anyone may throw himself/herself to the justice and mercy of the gods. The inquisitors will subject the appellant to the Test of Fire which is presumed to be foolproof and which surrounds the guilty in flames instantly. The innocent, however, must renounce their former lives and serve the gods for life under pain of death and damnation.

A quick survey of the Sanctuary legal and para-legal apparatus can only hint at its intricacies which may be best described as Byzantine. There is nothing here of the gentle arts of bribery and coercion. The legal profession itself is only implied and not described. As with most putative justice systems it is milder toward those with money and status, most ruthless toward the underclasses and strangers. The best way to deal with it is not to get caught in the first place.

A LETTER FROM PETRULE

Steve Perrin

To the illustrious and puissant Henri, Duke of Varran,
 Most righteous Lord of the Privy Chamber
 To His Majesty Leon, King of Caronne and the Western Isles,
 Humble greetings and respectful salutations from your obedient servant, Petrule, Scholar of the University of Caronne.

Fulsome blessings upon your House and may the Lord Sun shine ever upon your endeavors!

As you in your wisdom directed, I journeyed to the city of Sanctuary, southernmost of the cities of the Rankan Empire, to observe the spectacle of the city dying. I must humbly express my fear that we have been cheated of the aforesaid spectacle, but see instead the frailties of census takers and hear the lamentable results of harkening to exaggerated tales of disaster by parasitic merchants.

By virtue of your kind introductory letters, I have feasted with the Prince Governor Kadakithis and listened to learned discourses by the ArchPriest Molin Torchholder. I have also bribed the major-domo for palace gossip, consulted a winsome S'Danzo seeress, attended the meetings of long-winded and self-important merchants and, most importantly, talked long and heatedly with two of the major intellects of Sanctuary, the sorcerer Enas Yorl and Lady Myrtis, the mistress of Aphrodisia House.

The Prince's official population tally for this city is some 4,500 souls. Because of typical Rankan mercantilism, this figure is based on the tax rolls. Those who do not pay taxes (as well as those whose taxes are collected but never recorded) are not on the rolls. The Prince himself feels that there is at least one unrecorded resident for every two listed on the rolls. I feel he has too high an opinion of his tax collectors.

I include a quotation from the first Rankan governor, a simple soldier put in charge immediately after the conquest, before the final subjugation of the Kingdom of Ils. The Prince himself gave me a copy of this report as an example of the inefficiency he is correcting, but I fear that the spirit of this unnamed governor lives on in the officialdom of this city.

"My Illustrious Friend and Joy of my Liver!

Taking a census of the vermin of this city is both difficult and useless. Although I have passed three years in this place, I have neither counted the buildings nor have I inquired into the number of their inhabitants; and as to what one person loads on his mules and the other stows away in the bottom of his ship, that is no business of mine. But, above all, as to the previous history of this city, Savankala only knows the amount of dirt and heresy that the Wiggles may have eaten before the coming of the sword of Vashanka. It were unprofitable for us to inquire into it. O my soul! O my lamb! Seek not after the things which concern thee not..."

I can only hope for the sake of the writer that he was not speaking to his military superior.

[here follow some paragraphs describing the venality and ignorance of the city tax collectors.]

I suspected that the impending death of Sanctuary had been much exaggerated when I first walked the streets. The streets teem with people, primarily of the lower classes, who are rarely taxable. Many of the abandoned buildings are called haunted, but they are not haunted by ghosts, but instead by families of landless refugees who hide in them to escape the wretchedness of Downwind hovels. Others of these buildings are known to have their inner rooms refurbished by various criminals or by otherwise honest merchants who do not wish the tax collectors to realize the opulence of their living conditions.

Using our sophisticated Caronnian mathematics of probability, I feel that the population is more on the order of 20,000 not 4,500.

[here follows a lengthy mathematical proof of the theory.]

In short, the caravans stopped when the mountain passes were opened, as everyone knows. Many Rankan merchants used this as an excuse to leave the city, for their livelihoods were gone. Long-time residents such as Enas Yorl and Lady Myrtis realize that these merchants fed on a temporary increase in prosperity. This city was home to thousands long before the Rankan Empire learned of its existence.

The surrounding land supports many farms, one of the reputed "kings" of the S'Danzo uses the Bazaar here as his capital, wizards have found the lack of regulation and repression congenial, the fishing fleet is large, and passing merchant ships find Sanctuary's position on the tip of the continent a convenient stopover and refuge from the marauding Cape Pirates.

There are too many reasons for the city to survive, and too few for it to die. If the Prince is truly successful in his campaign to make the city a safe place to live, Sanctuary may become the premiere city of the Rankan Empire. As the true prosperity of the city becomes obvious, and the riffraff and thieves are replaced by or reformed into tax-paying citizens, the Prince will have quite a surprise in his city's population growth.

If Sanctuary quickly emerges into too strong a rivalry with Ranke, Prince Kadakithis may need to protect himself against the jealousies of his redoubtable brother. But that, my lord, is a subject for another letter.

My humble wishes for your excellent health and the welfare of Caronne.

PETRULE

V.

THE GODS OF SANCTUARY

Steve Marsh

We may divide the gods of Sanctuary into three cycles. The first is the old cycle, the gods under which the city was founded. The second is the new cycle, the conquerors, the gods under which Sanctuary is ruled. The third is the enduring cycle, the gods without the pattern which are yet worshipped. The third cycle also includes gods that do not fit into the local cycles at all.

The gods will be described in their mythic relationships and in terms of standard anthropological models and patterns.

Cycle One

The cycle begins with IIs of a Thousand Eyes and Shipri All-Mother. IIs is a god of knowledge and wisdom and probably a trickster figure. His domain is mastery by knowledge and the blunting of brute force. He is not a god who smashes his enemies down but one who beguiles, misleads, finds their hidden weaknesses, and eventually tricks and destroys them. He is a god for thieves, shamans, and leaders who need to know the time to plant crops and the time to harvest them. IIs is a pastoral wiseman god and an urban trickster god.

IIs' wife and co-ruler is Shipri All-Mother. Shipri is a fertility goddess. Her aspect is that of bearing life. Her worshipers would include women who seek fertility or those who are bearing children. She is probably the healing goddess of this pantheon.

The next god of the cycle is Anen, god of grain and of beer. He is probably a wounded or a dying god whose death occurs every fall and whose rebirth comes every spring with the new crop. His worship probably contains ritual cannibalism, where the worshipers drink new beer and eat barley bread. His domains are the croplands. His worship would be seasonal and marked by ritual and festivities.

The wife of Anen is Eshi, the other half of fertility. Just as Shipri is the one who is fecund, Eshi is the one who is sensuous. She is appropriately the wife of the grain god. Her rituals would be celebrated with his; when his fields are sown, so would hers be (as was done in ancient England). When he is eaten and drunk, she eases his transition.

While Eshi would not be continuously worshipped (except by prostitutes) she would receive a great deal of attention at her yearly rituals and from those seeking help in seduction or marriage. There is nothing to indicate whether she is faithful or free and as such the flavor of her worship is probably left to personal taste.

The next generation of the children of IIs are Thufir and Thilli. Thufir is a god of travel and a patron of trade and pilgrims. He is the road god, the one who connects, the unifier of villages into nations. Thufir's worship would be kept by those who travel often and those who live by trade.

His wife is Thilli. She was left undefined but is probably a hearth goddess since one is needed at this point in the development of the pantheon. She would be allied with Shipri as a protector of mothers and homes, but more than that she would focus on the hearth fire and warmth.

The last gods were born as cities came to be. They are Shalpa and Theba. Shalpa is a god of thieves and outcasts and is a lesser aspect of the trickster. Shalpa is active.

If Shalpa is the god of thieves and outcasts that fights back, Theba is the god of outcasts and weaklings that comforts. Theba is thought of as the weakling's god and is a god of peace. It is Theba who gives Shalpa refuge when Shalpa is harried or has consumed his/her luck.

Cycle Two

The second cycle is that of Savankala's. Savankala is a god of the sun and of passion. He joined with Sabellia, a god of stars, and they, or their fiery passion, bore twelve children. Each of their children contained a passion—treachery, greed, violence, lust, and eight more. Eleven of the children turned against their parents to consume them. One, Vashanka, stood by his parents, and by the power of his passion (violence) neutralized the rest. His ten brothers he slew and his sister he raped. By this act he became the manifestation of his parents on the earth and the three are often worshipped as a trinity.

Savankala is a god of light, heat, and life. It is the sun that brings life and warmth to the day, the sun that drives away the dark, and the sun that man must thank for all that he has.

His wife Sabellia is a god of stars and lore. It is her ability to reach men in any circumstance and touch their minds and hearts. She is close, yet distant, and provides some alternative for the nonviolent worshipper.

The son of the Stars and Sun is Vashanka. He is a god of violence and war. That which he touches causes death and destruction. Vashanka is a limited god, for anything he does must be violent. He cannot make love, only rape; he cannot harvest, only pillage; he does not rest. He is an ideal god for war but an impossible god for peace. Since Sabellia is so far removed and so ethereal, in the lands Vashanka conquers the gods he forces to "flee" may actually remain. Thus his worship has not progressed much in Sanctuary.

Vashanka can impart his nature into weapons. Such weapons cost the buyer dear (often both life energy levels and strictures), and those who cannot afford the price die. In return the weapon contains the price paid manifested in a violent or passionate form. Fear, hate, death, poison, rancor, all are contained in Vashanka's weapons.

The last member of the cycle is Azyuna, ever-raped upon the bed of Vashanka. Her nature is betrayal, and it is she that seduced the 10 brothers into the revolution against Savankala. Vashanka's continuous rape of her destroys her powers. She is worshipped only by desperate men who can find no other aid.

Azyuna seeks to sleep with mortal men that she can betray. Each time she is able to manifest herself this way she gains in power. She is ever-attempting avatars and then betraying her lovers to Vashanka.

Any mythologist will note that this structure is rather bare and that these gods, while well-suited to conquering lands, are not well-suited to keeping them. They don't fit the full needs of a people as well as the old cycle gods do. Perhaps more gods will emerge from the Savankala/Sabellia union (for Sabellia seems to have the necessary sophistication), or mortals will ascend and join (if they can overcome their natures and successfully overcome mortality), or other gods will be incorporated into the pantheon (for what else are conquered gods for?) or Ten-Slayer will release some of the natures he consumed. Of course these gods may fail rather than grow.

Cycle Three

This cycle includes two enduring gods whose dominions are the waste places and the unmastered ways.

The first is Dyareela. This is the god of blood and lust, the wasting god, the bringer of deserts, the soul of entropy, the great dark. Dyareela is the true demon, the antigod. Just as the gods fulfill a function, and compete with each other to fulfill it, Dyareela stands in opposition to gods and their works. What they build up, she corrupts and consumes.

Dyareela's worship has two aspects. The first is wanton debauchery. This is lust without fertility, consumption without rebirth. The second aspect is the deeper one and follows in Dyareela's worship. This is consumption and death. Where the first aspect would use (rather than share) sex, the second would consume it—including the death of the partner in the act. Dyareela is very similar to the Black Earth Goddess of India (Kali Durga) whom the English stamped out and who was worshipped in a similarly obscene fashion.

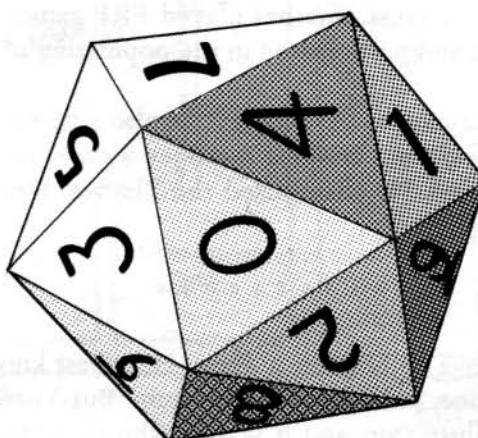

Above all else, Dyareela consumes, corrupts, and perverts.

Dyareela is countered by Heqt. Heqt appears to be a god of the waste places and a reclamer. The toad, the rain bringer and god of enduring life—just as a toad endures in the desert, Heqt renews and reclaims and guards against and in the waste places. She is the enemy of Dyareela. Because Heqt is able to bring forth life from hiding, she is often mistaken for being a creator of life.

Heqt is worshipped by all who travel by trail or travel the waste places. She is strong, opposing evil and cleaning the lands of it.

The last named god is Weda Krizhtawn. She is the only major sea god mentioned and appears to be of ancient heritage. Her worship is complex and her strictures numerous. She is only noted here as she is not a part of the city of Sanctuary.

Also we have the Blue Star. The Blue Star is a power, not a god. Its strength is not determined by the number of its worshipers. Instead it imparts an attribute for a purpose. The attribute is magical power and the purpose is the fight against chaos. In order to use the attribute, the initiate of the Blue Star must abide a constraint (known as the secret). Abiding the constraint allows the initiate to draw and use the power.

ABOUT MIDKEMIA

Begun two years ago by Stephen Abrams and Jon Everson, Midkemia Press is a rapidly-growing publisher of FRP game supplements. The company is named for the world of Midkemia, the FRP world constructed by a group of friends over the last eight years. It is on Midkemia that the bulk of the company's game aids are located. Specializing in cities, designed for use with any game system, Midkemia Press also produces game master's aids and computer games. The company consists of April and Stephen Abrams, Anita and Jon Everson, and Raymond E. Feist.

APRIL ABRAMS is finishing her Master's degree in biology; she works primarily in graphics, design, and editing for Midkemia. She has been active in FRP for five years. April was project director for Midkemia's contribution to Thieves' World.

STEPHEN ABRAMS is a computer systems analyst as well as managing partner for Midkemia Press. He works in all areas of the company's projects, being the primary designer of the company's growing line of computer games. Stephen has been involved with wargaming for over twenty years and with fantasy role-playing nearly since its inception. He designed many of the encounter tables and initially edited the manuscript.

ANITA EVERSON works as an industrial chemist. She is primarily involved in graphic design, including calligraphy, for Midkemia Press. She has played FRP games for six years. She did initial illustrations for building interiors, and participated in the populating of Sanctuary.

JON EVERSON is active in experimental psychology; he also designs games for Midkemia. He consults with other Midkemia Press writers, bringing a unique viewpoint to their creations, as well as designing FRP and computer games. He customized the Thieves' World events table and designed the multi-level Maze map.

* * * * *

YUREK CHODAK does not belong to Midkemia Press. He is best known in FRP circles as the new editor of Different Worlds magazine, published by Chaosium. But Yurek's former occupation was as an architectural draftsman and illustrator, and it was he who took the pencil-sketches furnished by Midkemia and turned them into the lucid plans, maps, and drawings which grace this Adventure Pack. Translation of the Midkemia efforts frequently meant accepting editorial alterations, incorporating newly-noticed textual references, and also attempting to create structurally-sound building plans ("If I don't put that wall there, the building will COLLAPSE!").

ENCOUNTERS

© 1981 Midkemia Press

The Encounters section of this book is presented both geographically and by time of day. Gamemasters are urged to read the instructions carefully before using the tables. Business generation also is handled in a systematic fashion; gamemasters will need to work extensively with this section of the book when first setting up a campaign.

ENCOUNTER INSTRUCTIONS

Contrary to most fantasy role-playing games, the gamemaster should not try to run too many players at one time while running a city. We find a mix of 1-2 players to be optimal, with 4 being a very real maximum even with very experienced players. If more players are run, someone will always be bored, since the G.M. can only interact with one player at a time. Conversely, the number of characters is not particularly important, as only one character can be active per player at any given moment.

These tables are designed to be used every 10-15 minutes. Use them more frequently if things are lagging and less often if the players are actively involved with something. Some "no encounters," and a large number of situations that will not directly affect the characters are included.

A significant number of encounters start with "accidentally bumps...." This represents the jostling the characters would receive in any busy street and helps to prevent thieves from becoming too obvious. Another encounter might specify "...recognizes character...mistakenly...correctly." This represents the chance that a passerby might correctly or mistakenly think he knows the character. He may in fact be a long-lost pal, brother, cellmate, etc. that the player just doesn't happen to 'remember'. Alternately, the encounter could be a simple case of mistaken identification. Use your imagination. Both of these situations are perfect for getting the players involved in something.

Die notation is standardized as follows: the number before the 'D' represents the number of dice to be thrown; the number following the 'D' is the type of die to throw. For example: 1D6 means throw one six-sided die; 3D8 means throw three eight-sided dice; D100 means roll a percentile (roll 2D10, using one for the 10's digit and the other for the 1's digit, giving numbers from 01-00, with 00 always high).

Encounters in Sanctuary mostly vary by the area of town in which the player character finds himself. Within a given area, the time of day and size of the street can also affect the type of encounter.

The Special Area Encounters tables refer to a "Westside table" —that is the Westside portion of the General City Encounters, on the next page.

Area

The gamemaster should first note in which area of town the encounter takes place. The main city is divided into three neighborhoods: Jeweler's Quarter; Processional and Westside. In addition, there are four special areas: the Maze, Downwind, the Bazaar, and the Street of Red Lanterns. Each special area has its own encounter table, divided into day, evening, and night (all streets in the special areas are considered minor streets). The three main city neighborhoods have encounter matrices that correlate the encounter with the time of day and size of street, referring the gamemaster to the proper encounter table which outlines the encounter.

Time of Day

The time is divided into three periods: "day" is from dawn to dusk, "evening" is from dusk to midnight, and "night" is from midnight to dawn.

Street Size

In the main city, (Jeweler's Quarter, Processional and Westside) the streets are divided into major and minor sizes. The narrower streets which wind within blocks are considered minor streets, while those through streets which pass by more than one block are considered major streets. This designation is at the gamesmaster's discretion. Because the special areas of Downwind, Bazaar, Maze, and the Street of the Red Lanterns are all poor neighborhoods with few, if any, through streets, all streets in these areas are considered minor streets.

The encounter tables provide a brief outline of an encounter which can easily be fleshed out by the gamemaster to reflect his own world's unique personality.

TABLE 7G-RUMORMONGER

NOTE: A good "feel" for his city's personality and familiarity with the internal conflicts and history will make the GM's playing of a rumormonger as an NPC easy and useful. A rumormonger can be used to give out information, false or true, that will allow the GM to lead player characters toward or through an adventure without stepping outside the context of the game. Unless the result says the information is reliable, it is up to the GM to determine if the rumors are true.

— Roll 1D20 —

SPECIALS

These are events that happen only very rarely, and usually have a large impression on characters, possibly endangering or changing their lives. Those events listed are suggestions which should be added to by GM.

– Roll 1D20 –

roll result

1-6 characters witness a duel between two extremely powerful magicians; complete with destruction of buildings, large special effects, etc. GM should decide if one is killed, both retreat, etc. Participants may be, among others, Enas Yori, Mizraith or Lythande (see Personailites of Sanctuary). There is a chance characters will be caught in the magical backlash with strange or harmful effects.

7-8 character hears that a god is hearing petitions at his or her Temple for a limited amount of time.* The God is (1D20):
 1-3 Savankala
 4-6 Vashanka
 7-10 IIs
 11-13 Shipri
 14-17 Sabellia
 18-20 Thufir

*There is a 50% chance the character will get to the temple in time, and a 30% chance that he will be admitted unless he has previously worshipped at that temple. If admitted to the Presence with a petition, it is up to the GM to decide the result, although few gods would be likely to give gifts for no reason beyond flattery. Many gods are susceptible to anger or boredom and can just as easily penalize a petitioner as help him.

characters come upon guards sieging a house/business where workers/slaves are holding their boss/master hostage (1D20):

1-15 characters are impressed into crowd control while the guards storm the building; 20% chance someone is hurt
 16-20 the guards hold back the crowd while the characters are ordered to go in after the hostage(s)

the city is attacked by:

1D2 sikkintairs, and 1D4 demons, and
 1D100 desert raiders

the Emperor of Ranke (for some obscure reason) is passing a night in Sanctuary on a trip through the Empire, causing massive confusion, panic and general mayhem for all who work in the Governor's palace, and throughout the entire city to a large extent; a huge pageant is planned and security is very tight.

SPECIAL AREA ENCOUNTERS

The Maze

"Only those who seek death or sell it enter the Maze"

The Maze, a labyrinth of foul-smelling, dark alleys winding between, old, decaying buildings, forms the roughest part of Sanctuary's poor quarter. This malodorous neighborhood is populated by fugitives from justice, poor laborers with nothing left to be stolen, smugglers who use the rat's nest of tunnels beneath the Maze, bravos, toughs, slavers and a few odd craftsmen—forgers, knife sharpeners, etc. Above them all, the alley-mobster lordlings exist in fierce competition. The town watch refuses to enter the streets of the Maze and even the Hell Hounds enter carefully and disguised. In the center of the Maze crouches the Vulgar Unicorn, a rough-and-tumble tavern where wine and life are cheap, but never dull.

Single-story, two-story and a few three-story buildings are scattered without plan or purpose through the Maze, giving this area its name. The alleys and streets, often overhung or covered by second-stories, littered with rubble, and garbage, are as dark and twisted as the hearts of its inhabitants. The one-story buildings are flimsy shacks leaning up against the older, mostly wooden two-story structures. Some of these two-story buildings are abandoned warehouses, partitioned into squalid, half-empty tenements for those unfortunate enough to live here. Private interior stairways or trap doors leading to second stories indicate buildings still standing from earlier, better times. Others have external stairs, often connecting with adjacent buildings and thus turning the alleys below into tunnels, creating another level or escape route and pathway for those who know the area. It is possible for a clever thief to clamber to the roof of a shack, then further to the roof of the second story, in an effort to move unseen.

The few three-story buildings are ancient stone buildings with inner courtyards and gardens in a happier time. The roofs of these are studded with sharp iron spikes to discourage climbers. Here live the masters of the Maze, the mobster chieftains and the most successful smugglers.

Many of the buildings in the Maze have cellars with entrances into the labyrinth of tunnels and sewers beneath this part of the city. Narrow and convoluted, they serve as highways for smugglers and a hideaway for secret societies. The tunnels are usually 2-3' wide and about 5' high. The sewers, this size or slightly larger, are traps for the unwary. Twice a day some will fill with a tidal bore funnelled into the sewers from the Swamp of Night Secrets. The tidal bore carries a wave of poisonous swamp gas before it as it rushes up the sewers, partially filling the tunnels. Given enough concentration, swamp gas can also be explosive, prompted by any open flame.

We suggest the Maze be run as a "dungeon," sight unseen by the players. For this reason, the Player's map has been left blank in this area, and two separate maps of the Maze are included: one of the street level and one of the tunnels. The street-level map is coded for 1-story and 2-story buildings; a few 3-story buildings exist, as well as covered alley-ways. The gamemaster will be able to visualize which rooftops are easily accessible from exterior stairs. This should allow realistic running of characters who need to move along unusual paths.

26-31	31-37	31-40	character is alone or separated from his party, is robbed (1D20): 1-10 the robbers threaten him but only attack if necessary 11-14 the robbers club him from behind doing 1D4 damage (-2 for metal helm, -1 for leather helm) 15-20 the robbers can be frightened away (they are urchins) by offensive action
32-37	38-45	41-47	characters hear a scream (1D20): 1-10 from a half ajar door in a nearby building 11-20 from a second story window if the characters investigate they will find (1D20): 1-10 a rather beefy woman on her knees being struck by a large, drunk angry man with 1D4 children crying in the corner* 11-20 a man with a torch in one hand and a bottle of whiskey in the other bending over a man strapped to a table. In the shadows are two armed warriors. The man on the table had a wound cauterized and the warriors will not appreciate interference. *If the characters distract the man, the woman will (1D20): 1-7 remain on her knees crying 8-10 run crying to the children and hug them 11-14 run to the children and hustle them from the room 15-18 grab a broom and start beating the man 19-20 grab a broom and start beating the character for interfering
38-43	46-51	48-55	character sees a large man about to strike a cowering, beautiful woman in the nearest 5' alley. Hidden in the shadows (20% chance characters will notice unless they are specifically stopping and looking, then 60% chance they will notice) are four armed thugs with a weighted net. If the characters do not notice and enter the alley, there is a 75% chance they will be entangled. The thugs and the woman are slavers.
44-45	52-55	56-60	characters see two armed and armored warriors with a sea bag at their feet in a shadowed area. They (1D6): 1-2 hear a moan just before they see the warriors (+1 for excellent hearing) 3-6 don't hear anything the warriors, if approached, will try to pick up the bag (it's obviously heavy) and move off. For every round the characters pause to investigate, there is a 30% chance the characters will hear a moan from the bag and see it jerk. Inside the bag is a gagged 12 year-old boy, son of a wealthy Sanctuary merchant being held for ransom.

The Bazaar

The Bazaar is a teeming confusion of sights, smells, and sounds. Beginning early every morning, the crowds throng to buy first produce from the farmers' market, then other items in the Bazaar itself. The crowded booths and tents offer every imaginable product, legal or not, with plenty of food, wine, and ale to keep the clientele happy.

Some people live as well as work within the Bazaar walls. Many of these are S'Danzo, a gypsy-like folk who specialize in fortune-telling as well as selling wares from ragged booths. Other people of the Bazaar provide services or entertainment for the daily crowds: they live in the permanent structures built against the Bazaar walls.

In contrast, the booths and tents of the Bazaar are taken down and replaced each day, although many locations are maintained for generations by particular merchants or vendors. Many of the merchants also have shops in town, and use the booths for illegal or cut-rate items.

A character in the Bazaar will be constantly jostled, bumped, and tripped by the throngs, making it difficult to notice if a pickpocket tries for his purse. A victim of a pickpocket may find the Bazaar folk reluctant to help. There is a strong feeling of unity between them, which can turn to hostility against outsiders.

Street of Red Lanterns

When Sanctuary was a bustling trade city, the respectable merchants and nobles did not want a neighborhood of brothels and gambling halls inside the main city, and therefore moved them to just outside the northwest wall.

Under the guidance of Myrtis of Aphrodisia House, the unofficial mayor of the street, the brothels, gambling houses, pawnshops, money-lenders, and vendors cater to all the needs of habitues. Occasional crafts-men and merchants also keep shop on the street.

Red Lanterns comes alive at sunset when Sanctuary's citizens appear, many wrapped in cloaks to hide their identities from acquaintances and the muggers and cutpurses attracted to the street by the clink of coins. At this time, too, a troop of unaffiliated ladies troop behind the Governor's Palace to Promise of Heaven park to ply their trade, returning at sunrise, often with bodyguards.

The evening patrol of the city guard appears infrequently, making the street an inviting place for all forms of business as the evening deepens to night.

Downwind

Downwind is the slum of a city of thieves. Here live the truly poor: drifters, winos, those with no skills, no land to farm, and no hope for the future. Little thievery occurs among Downwinders since none have anything worth stealing, but this just focuses attention on anyone else entering the neighborhood. Life is extremely cheap here, although the older inhabitants are often too apathetic to murder. Most of the violence comes from the gangs of teenagers and pre-teens who roam the streets looking for excitement and who are ready to kill out of boredom. Since the City Guard and even the Hell Hounds very rarely find reason to cross the White Foal

River, the gangs rule the streets, ignored or tolerated by the older members of the community. The wealthy families in Downwind are those who hold, through custom, the jobs of collecting the excrement and urine from the city, the excrement being sold to the farms for fertilizer and the urine to the laundry and tanners. Streets are ill-defined, and often are open paths between buildings, clogged with garbage and dung. Fires are common, devastating entire blocks of shacks because there is no organized effort to put them out. The only people who appreciate Downwind are the smugglers, who find it great cover for their operations in the Swamp of Night Secrets.

POPULATING SANCTUARY

BUSINESS GENERATION

These tables have been designed to allow the gamemaster to populate Sanctuary with businesses easily yet maintain the character of the city. Because businesses and shops were not placed randomly in medieval cities, the table involves more than simply choosing one business after another and placing them on the map. Use of these tables involves multiple rolls. In addition, parenthesized code letters next to several business types optionally may be used to provide even more realism for your city. Since these options require more attention to detail, they will lengthen the time needed to populate the city. To use the tables:

1. Note which area of the city you are populating. The named city area boundaries are shown on the Sanctuary map in the center of the Player's Guide.
2. Each area requires an initial roll on the appropriate Area Table, I-VII.
3. If the initial roll does not indicate a business, record this result and repeat the process for the next building.
4. If the initial roll requires a second roll on the Business Generating tables, VIII-X, an actual business occupies the building. The business type can be determined by a percentile roll and by consulting the indicated table. (Most shopkeepers will live above their shops with their families, although wealthy merchants might maintain a separate residence.)
- 5a. At this time the gamemaster may consult any code letters, if desired, and move the business to the nearest appropriate building which conforms with those code letters. If the business is moved to a new building, repeat step 6 below as needed in the new neighborhood. Once done with step 6 for that type of business, the GM can return to his original neighborhood and continue populating.
- 5b. Before placing any businesses on the map, the GM should check the Area Table to determine if the business rolled belongs on an already-named street. If it is, for example, weaving, and Weaver's Way has not already been populated, the business could be moved to this street and step 6 carried out for it. It is up to the GM to decide how many weavers need to be located on Weaver's Way—not all of them need to be. After carrying out step 6 for weavers, he can return to his original populating.
6. After each business type in tables VIII-X, there is a number entry for "re-occurrence roll." This is the chance that the next business rolled on the Area Tables for this area will be the same as the current business rolled. A re-occurrence roll is made immediately after each business is placed, and decreases by half each time a business actually re-occurs. See the example.
7. As each business is located on the map, a check should be placed after the number in the totals column. This number is the suggested total number of such businesses in Sanctuary, excluding the Special Areas IV-VII. Once that number of businesses has been located, further rolls calling for that business type should be rerolled on tables VIII-X. The initial roll on the Area Table should not be repeated for that building—this will prevent an unlikely string of random numbers from badly skewing the businesses. Some businesses appear on more than one table; each table has a sub-total of the number of businesses of this type in Sanctuary. Therefore the totals column on each table should be used up, not just for one table.

EXAMPLE

Goldsmiths have an 80% chance to re-occur, and the Area Table lists an Alley of Goldsmiths as one of the streets in Sanctuary. The gamemaster has been populating the Wide Way and has not yet populated the Alley. When the goldsmith is rolled, the gamemaster places this business in one of the buildings along the Alley and marks off one goldsmith from the totals column of the Business Generating tables. He then rolls for re-occurrence. He rolls a 72%—the business will re-occur. Therefore he continues populating the Alley, using the rolls from the appropriate Area Table, until the roll calls for a new roll from the Business Generating tables (VIII, IX, or X). At that time, instead of making the indicated roll on one of these three tables, he places another goldsmith in the building and marks off another from the totals column. He then repeats the re-occurrence roll. This time he must roll below 40% (80%/2) for the next business to again be a goldsmith. He rolls a 28, another goldsmith. As before, he makes the initial roll on the Area Table until a business is called for, and instead places another goldsmith, once again checking off a goldsmith from the totals column. This time the re-occurrence roll is only 20%, and he rolls a 34. Now he can return to Wide Way and continue populating as usual. He can finish populating the Alley when it comes up in his overall pattern of populating.

SUGGESTIONS

These tables will make a tedious task relatively quick and easy, yet realistic. But they are only an aid. If a business does not seem reasonable in a location, move it. If the random numbers create a ridiculous area, re-roll it, but let the tables do the majority of your work—your most interesting areas or businesses may come from rationalizing why a certain business is where it was placed by the table, even if it seems unlikely. Let your imagination have some fun!

An entire city need not be populated before it is run. A few major streets may suffice, with the others to be added later. In a pinch, a quick-thinking gamemaster could roll up a street during a game in a five-minute break. If you need a particular business where it hadn't been before, put it in an empty building, for people start and lose businesses all the time. Because of this, you should code your map with letter/number combinations, then record the codes, business types and associated notes in a loose-leaf binder. Let your imagination free and your Sanctuary will become an entity with unique character and flavor.

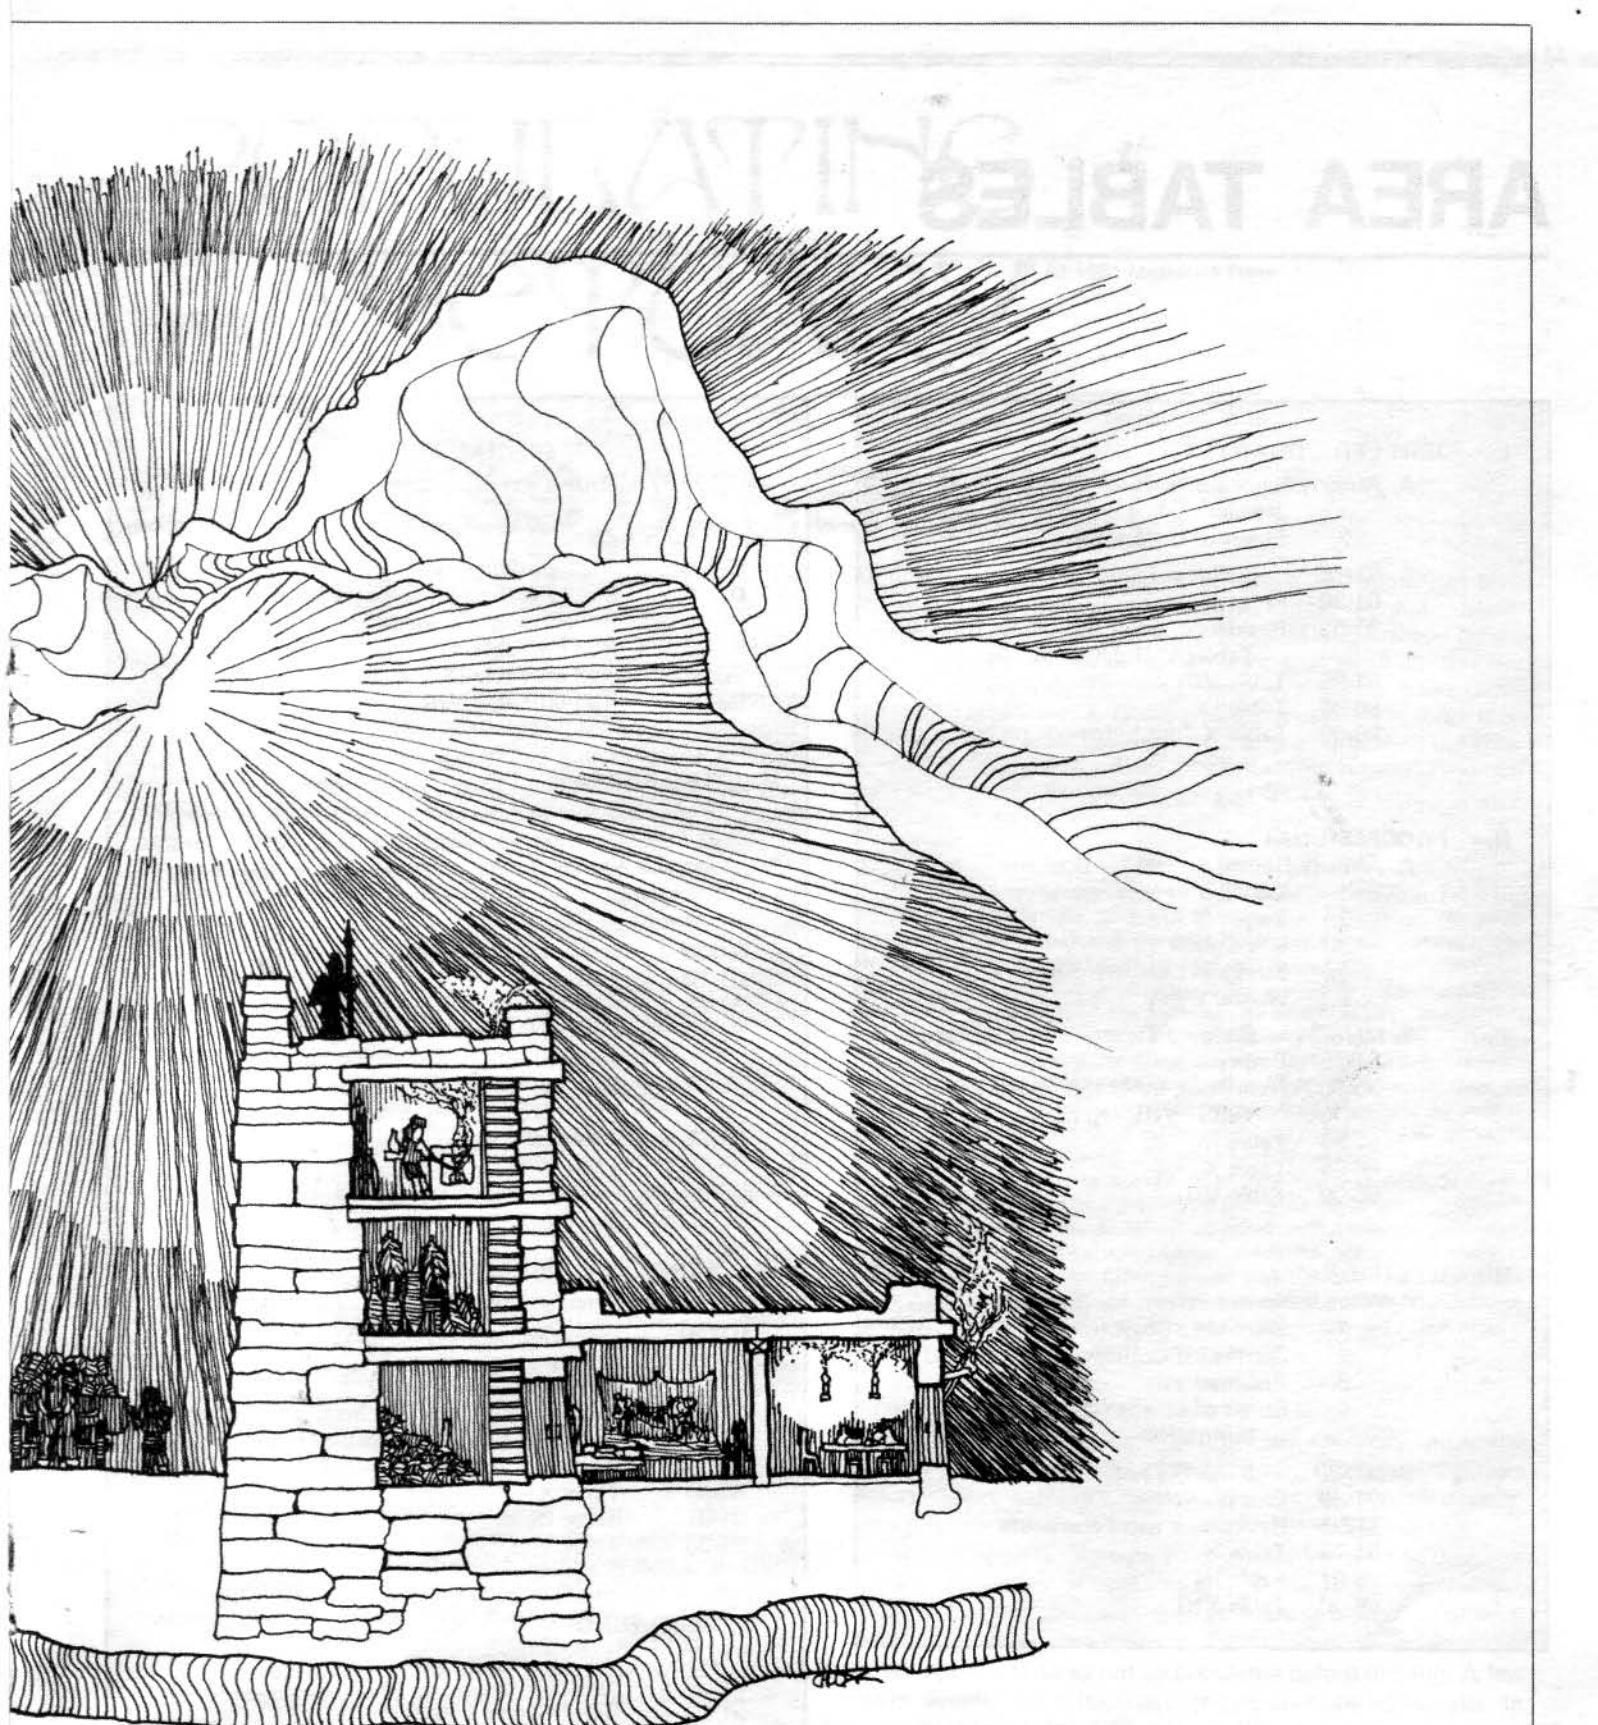

SANCTUARY CUT-AWAY

Yuri

In this sample cut-away drawing, the viewer looks west along Governor's Walk. An early waft of Sanctuary's frequent fog passes across the sun. The man and his banana-laden cart move east along the street.

To the right is a cross-section of the palace wall. Workplaces and storage rooms actually occupy much of the interior side of the wall. An armorer works in the uppermost room. To the furthest right is shown part of one of the structures built in the lee of the wall for various purposes. All of them originally would have had fire-proof roofs.

ek Chodak

An alchemist studies strange reactions in the building to the left of Governor's Walk. The outside of a building is shown to demonstrate the exposed-beam style of construction and that all windows in Sanctuary (at least all of those through which no visitors come) are barred.

*Below, armed men approach the alchemist's cellar through a tunnel. Their mission is unknown.

PLACES & PLANS

Nearly all maps and floorplans have been drawn to three scales: the large city map is at 1":200', the area maps are at 1":40', and the floorplans are at 1":10'. The Maze area map in the book is at a reduced scale to fit it into the book; a separate Maze map (and a Maze Underground map as well) is included in the box at the consistent 1":40' scale. The reduced city map in the players' guide is at a 1":400' scale; the sewer schematic on the back cover of this book is at 1":800'. The area maps (like the JQ map on the facing page) are illustrative not full maps of the named areas. The full areas are outlined in the Players' Guide.

JEWELERS QUARTER

JQ1 Residence, tanner. Damron the tanner owns the large, prosperous-looking tannery located at WS2. Since his business is relegated to the Street of Smells because of its odor, he maintains a residence here in the Jeweler's Quarter. His wife, Nora, is as blustery as he is nervous, which may be why Damron spends a lot of his time at the tannery. His habit of coming home in his work clothes, stained and reeking of curing hides, has made him unpopular with his swanky neighbors, to the disgust of his wife and two sons, and two daughters.

JQ2 Baker. Pantaleone is a very fat man of medium height. He loves children as much as he loves food, especially his own eight children. He mourns his late wife, Carla, but appreciates a nice figure and a pretty smile. He keeps a small jar of cookies under the display case for young "customers." He uses the best ingredients and is known for his creations in sugar frosting for cakes. Though his prices are high, they are reasonable for the quality. He maintains a day-old counter which has lower prices, and it is frequented by many housewives in Sanctuary. [Floorplan included.]

JQ3 Alchemist. Lakmed is a large, powerful man who looks more like a bouncer than an alchemist. A confirmed bachelor, he habitually daydreams, often breaking off in mid-conversation. His shop is well-lit, if a little disorganized. Only trusted friends are allowed behind the counter and fewer yet have been upstairs. He is unusual in Sanctuary, being strictly honest, giving good quality for good prices. He sells a few magic items, which are never advertized. [Floorplan included.]

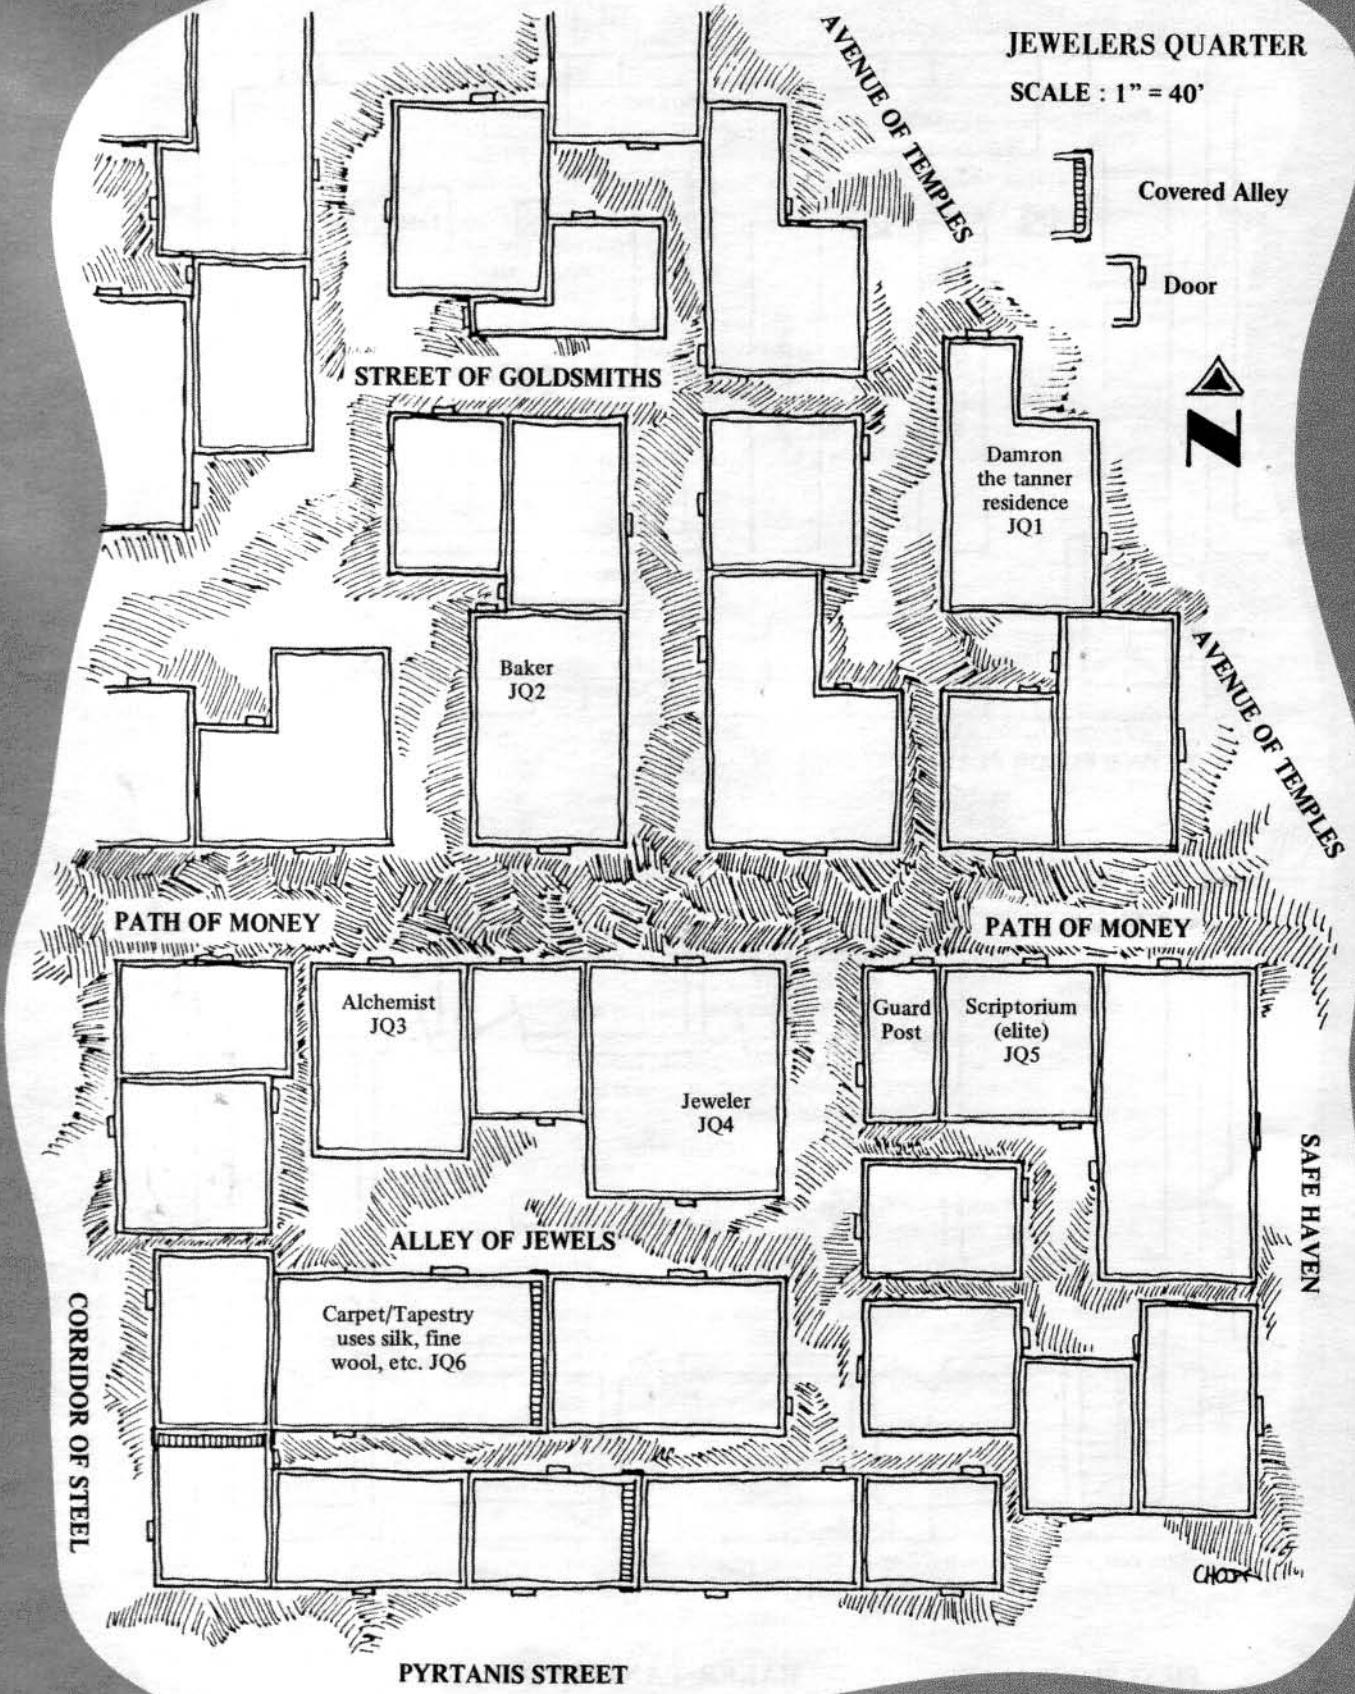

JQ4 Jeweler. A small, pretentious man, Herewick is proud of his skill in creating fine jewelery. He does excellent work, occasionally showing a flash of genius. None are allowed past the counter, and two guards enforce this. Herewick is devoted to his wife and two boys, although cold to anyone outside the family circle. Unknown to him, his oldest boy is a member of a gang of wealthy boys who terrorize Downwind for fun and excitement. Herewick is a top jeweler in Sanctuary, and his shop is often frequented by nobles. [Floorplan included.]

JQ5 Scriptorium. Gorolan and his wife Arta run this small, elite scriptorium. Although Meilot (see Personalities of Sanctuary) offers a wider knowledge of obscure languages, Gorolan provides honest work for a good price. His wife Arta specializes in multi-colored illumination and gold-leafing. They are training their son and daughter in their work, which is the finest in the city.

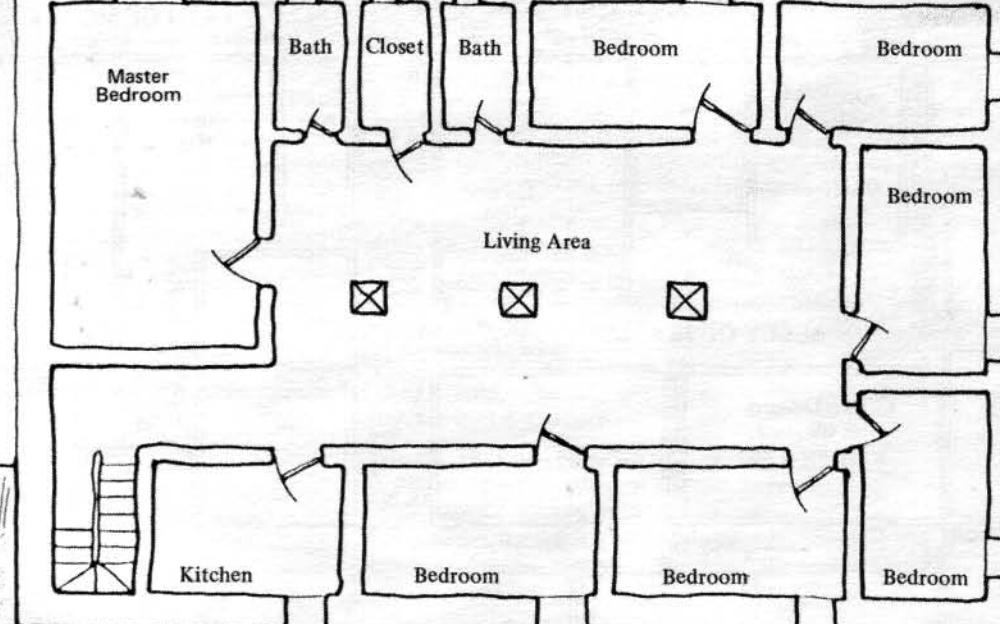

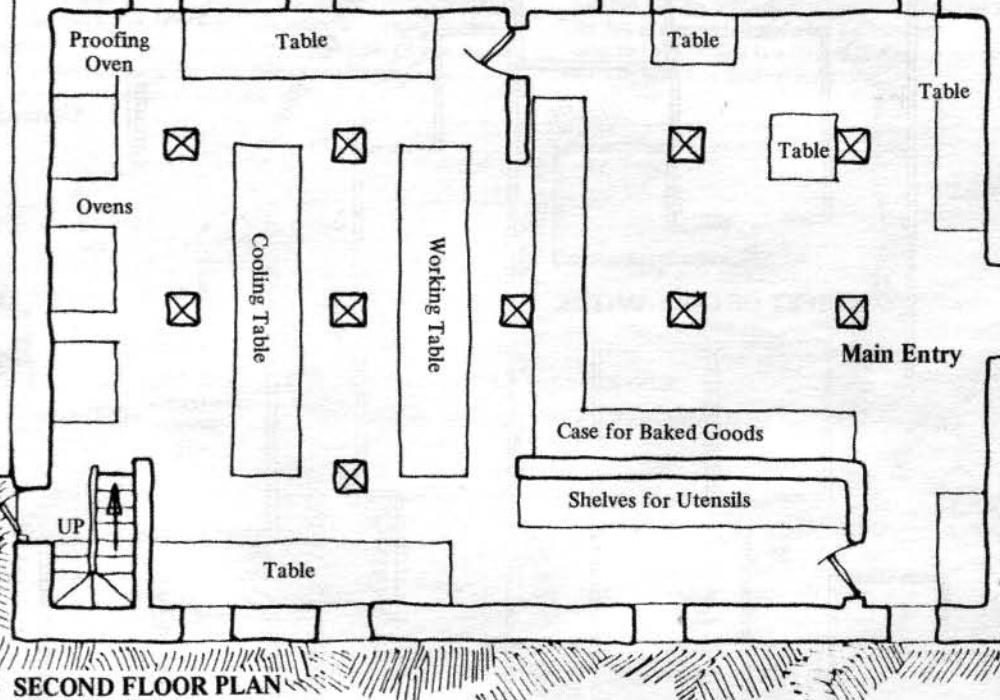

JQ6 Carpet/Tapestry-Maker. Zapala specializes in flat-woven rugs and tapestries, rather than the knotted rugs also produced in Sanctuary. He prides himself on having the best and most modern looms in the city, the constant expense of which cuts his profits drastically, much to the chagrin of his sharp-tongued wife, Karen. His brocaded rugs are his best item, and the finest for hundreds of miles. Zapala has good connections with top smugglers and Cape Pirates, from whom he gets some of the best silk and wool.

PR1 Scriptorium. Melilot's offers the most complete knowledge of languages in Sanctuary, although not the best work. Melilot, the proprietor, is a fat eunuch with a high whiny voice and black, greasy hair (see Personalities of Sanctuary). Dealing in forgery, blackmail and mistranslation, he has built a thriving business from very humble beginnings. He employs many scribes and a number of young, sweet-voiced boys who advertize his wares throughout Sanctuary. The scriptorium was once a family mansion, the property of a noble who wasted his money in gambling and drink. Subo of the House Kiri, the previous owner, now lives in the wattle and daub structure on the roof of the three story mansion. [Floorplan included.]

PR2 Silk Merchant. Hessel the owner is self-righteous, rich, arrogant, and fat. He is single, too in love with himself to be interested in anyone else. He desires only to make himself richer and more decadent. His bedroom upstairs could have belonged in the palace; his fingers are covered with expensive rings. His shop is reasonably well-lit, although the windows are heavily barred. Hessel deals in fine-quality bolts of silk, with some fine cotton and linen. Though expensive, his fabric is some of the best to be found in Sanctuary. [Floorplan included.]

PR3 Silk Merchant. Nichols and his wife, Sara, run a small shop selling spun silk and some finished goods. His quality is generally fair although an occasional lot of poorer quality finds its way into his dark shop. He and his wife long for a child and are suckers for any cute kid. He is not really interested in his small business, having inherited it from his father. [Floorplan included.]

PR4 Tavern, The Golden Oasis. Jord Blacktongue runs this profitable establishment, located on the largest street in Sanctuary. He and his wife Lorna and his two daughters serve average-to-good food for inflated prices. His rooms are sparsely furnished but well-barred, which is useful in Sanctuary. Jord got his name from his pessimistic outlook on life, which is offset by Lorna's cheerful nature. Lorna is very protective of her daughters, but not above a discreet dalliance herself with an attractive customer. Jord is somewhat blind to his wife's wanderings but extremely jealous once he notices.

PR5 Outfitter. Brigitte and her son Samson run a prosperous business selling various types of hardware and equipment useful to travellers and adventurers, as well as townspeople. Here you can find rope, spikes, hammers, a couple of old lamps, torches, waterskins and backpacks, etc. Although these items can also be purchased directly from their primary producers (leatherworkers, netmakers, etc.), the convenience of Brigitte's store enhances the number of her customers. Her low prices also help, which some say are due to connections with the Cape Pirates. None say it too loudly, since Brigitte stands almost as wide as she is tall, and what isn't bone is muscle. Her products are of good quality. Many appear to be slightly used.

PR6 Guard Post. This is the main office of the City Guard, from which Captain Aye-Gophlan commands his men (see Personalities of Sanctuary). It is also the best place for complaints to be made, although few in Sanctuary avail themselves of this service.

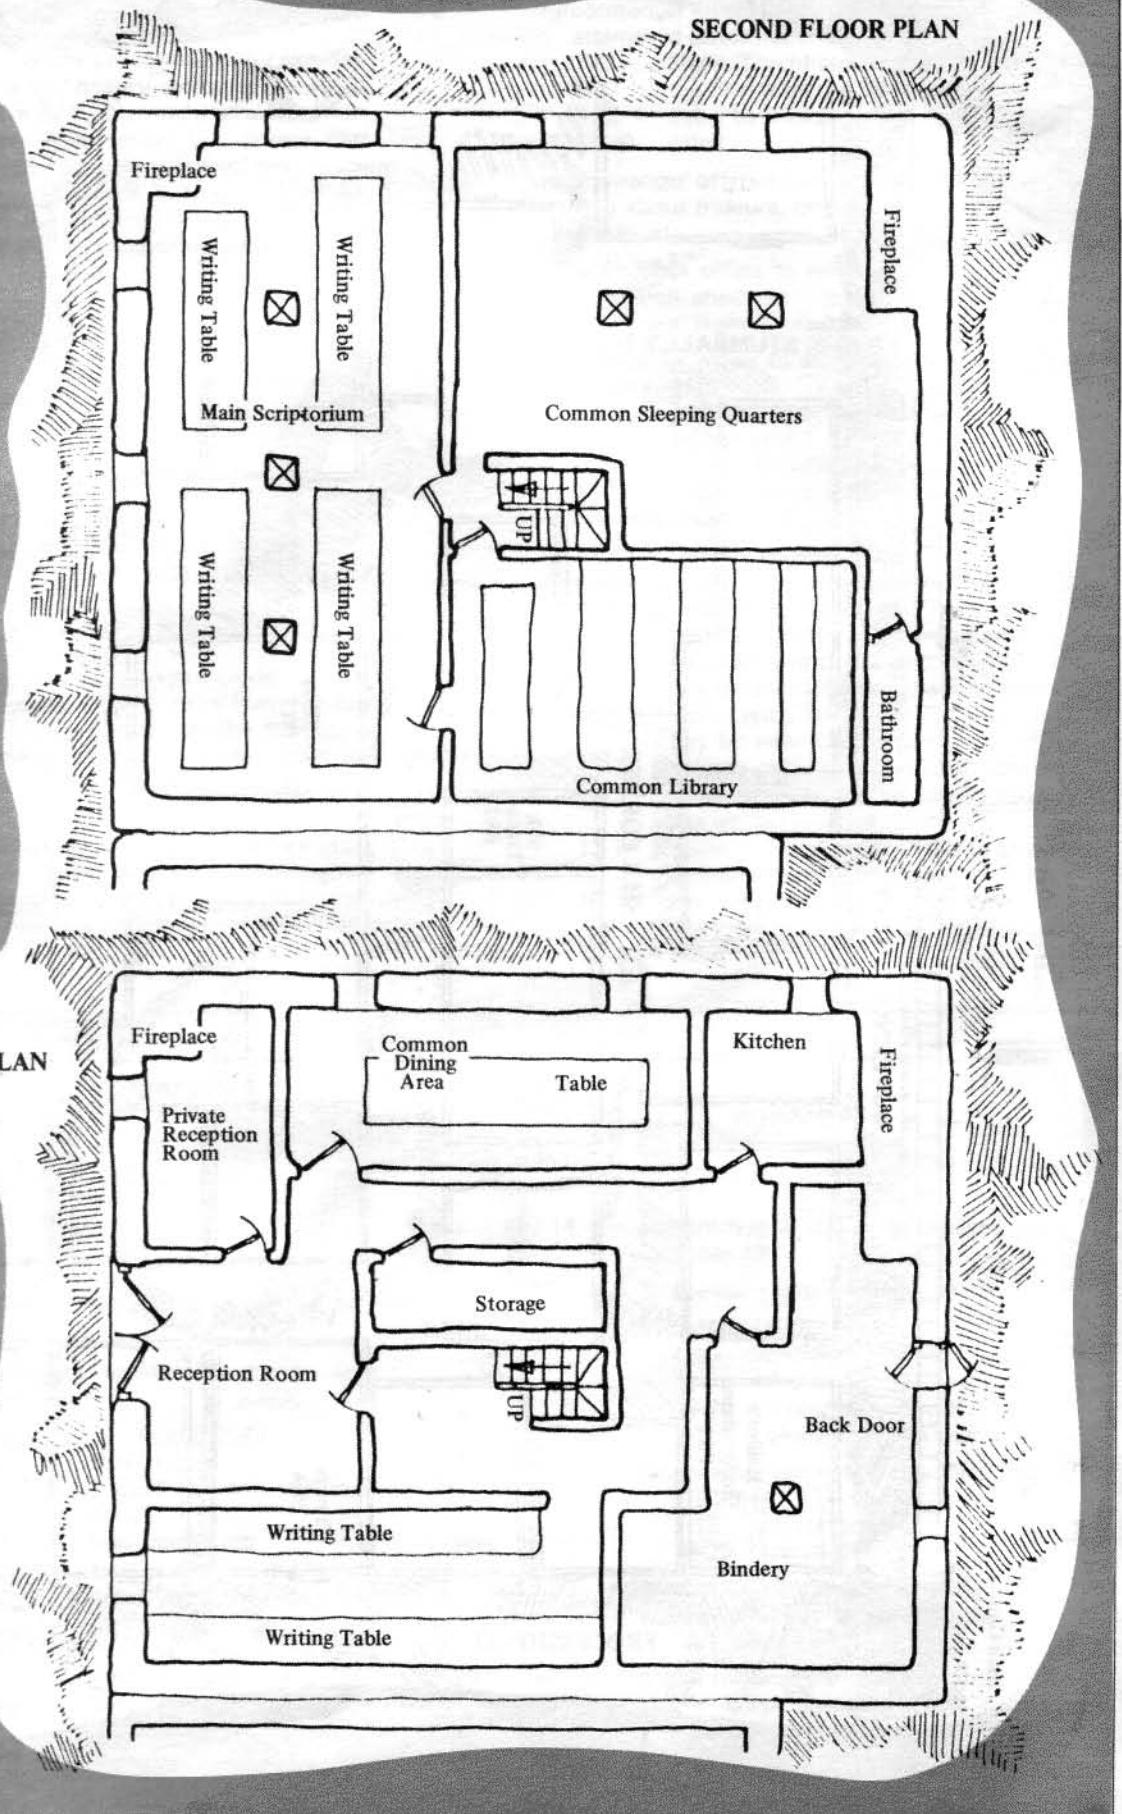

PR7 Tailor. Markan fashions dull, sturdy clothing for those in Sanctuary with enough money to buy rather than make their clothes. His clientele does not include the higher classes, who seek more fashion and fancier materials. He despairs such stuff as superfluous, to the distress of his wife Clarice, who enjoys a touch of frill here and there. His prices are quite reasonable.

WS1 Dyer. Sorahan, the owner, is seldom seen outside his office (when he is present at all). He is a well-off man who prefers to spend his time in areas where the air is sweeter. He is an astute businessman and trusts his loyal foreman (whom he pays very well) with the day-to-day operation. Walrad, the foreman, is a capable manager, and not too much shirking goes on under his eye. The shop is very busy and there is constant hustle and bustle in and out of the doors. The customers are all local, and quite a bit of silk goes in and out of Sorahan's doors. His work is usually well done, although on cheaper items the quality varies. [Floorplan included.]

WS2 Apothecary. Alten Stulwig is a physician and herbalist, although he does not deal in magical healing potions. He is well-versed in poisons and will sell his expertise as well as the product. A tall, dark man, he prides himself on his way with the ladies and will often attempt to procure payment from pretty ladies in the form of their favors (see Personalities of Sanctuary).

WS3 Tanner. Damron, the owner, seems to be everywhere at once. He can often be found alongside his workers—in fact, he looks like one of his workers. His clothes are usually stained and he reeks of hides. He is a small quick man with nimble fingers and has a nervous air about him. His managing foreman, Ton-Nu, usually spends a lot of his time keeping out of Damron's way. Damron's products range from the softest kid leather to sturdy hides and are usually well done. He tans all manner of leather from good to the poorest quality. He and his family live at JQ1. [Floorplan included.]

WS4 Charnel House. Run by two aging brothers, Gorse and Darl, this unpleasant building houses embalming and undertaking services. A slow-moving stream, a branch of the open sewer running down the Street of Smells, runs between this building and the tanners. It carries blood and slop west from this business and others like it, eventually dumping them into the Swamp of Night Secrets. It contributes to the unique odor of the area. The brothers have a reputation for being a bit odd; some say they prefer the company of their customers to that of normal people. They are not above accepting money for criminal use of bodies, or for accepting murder victims on the q.t.

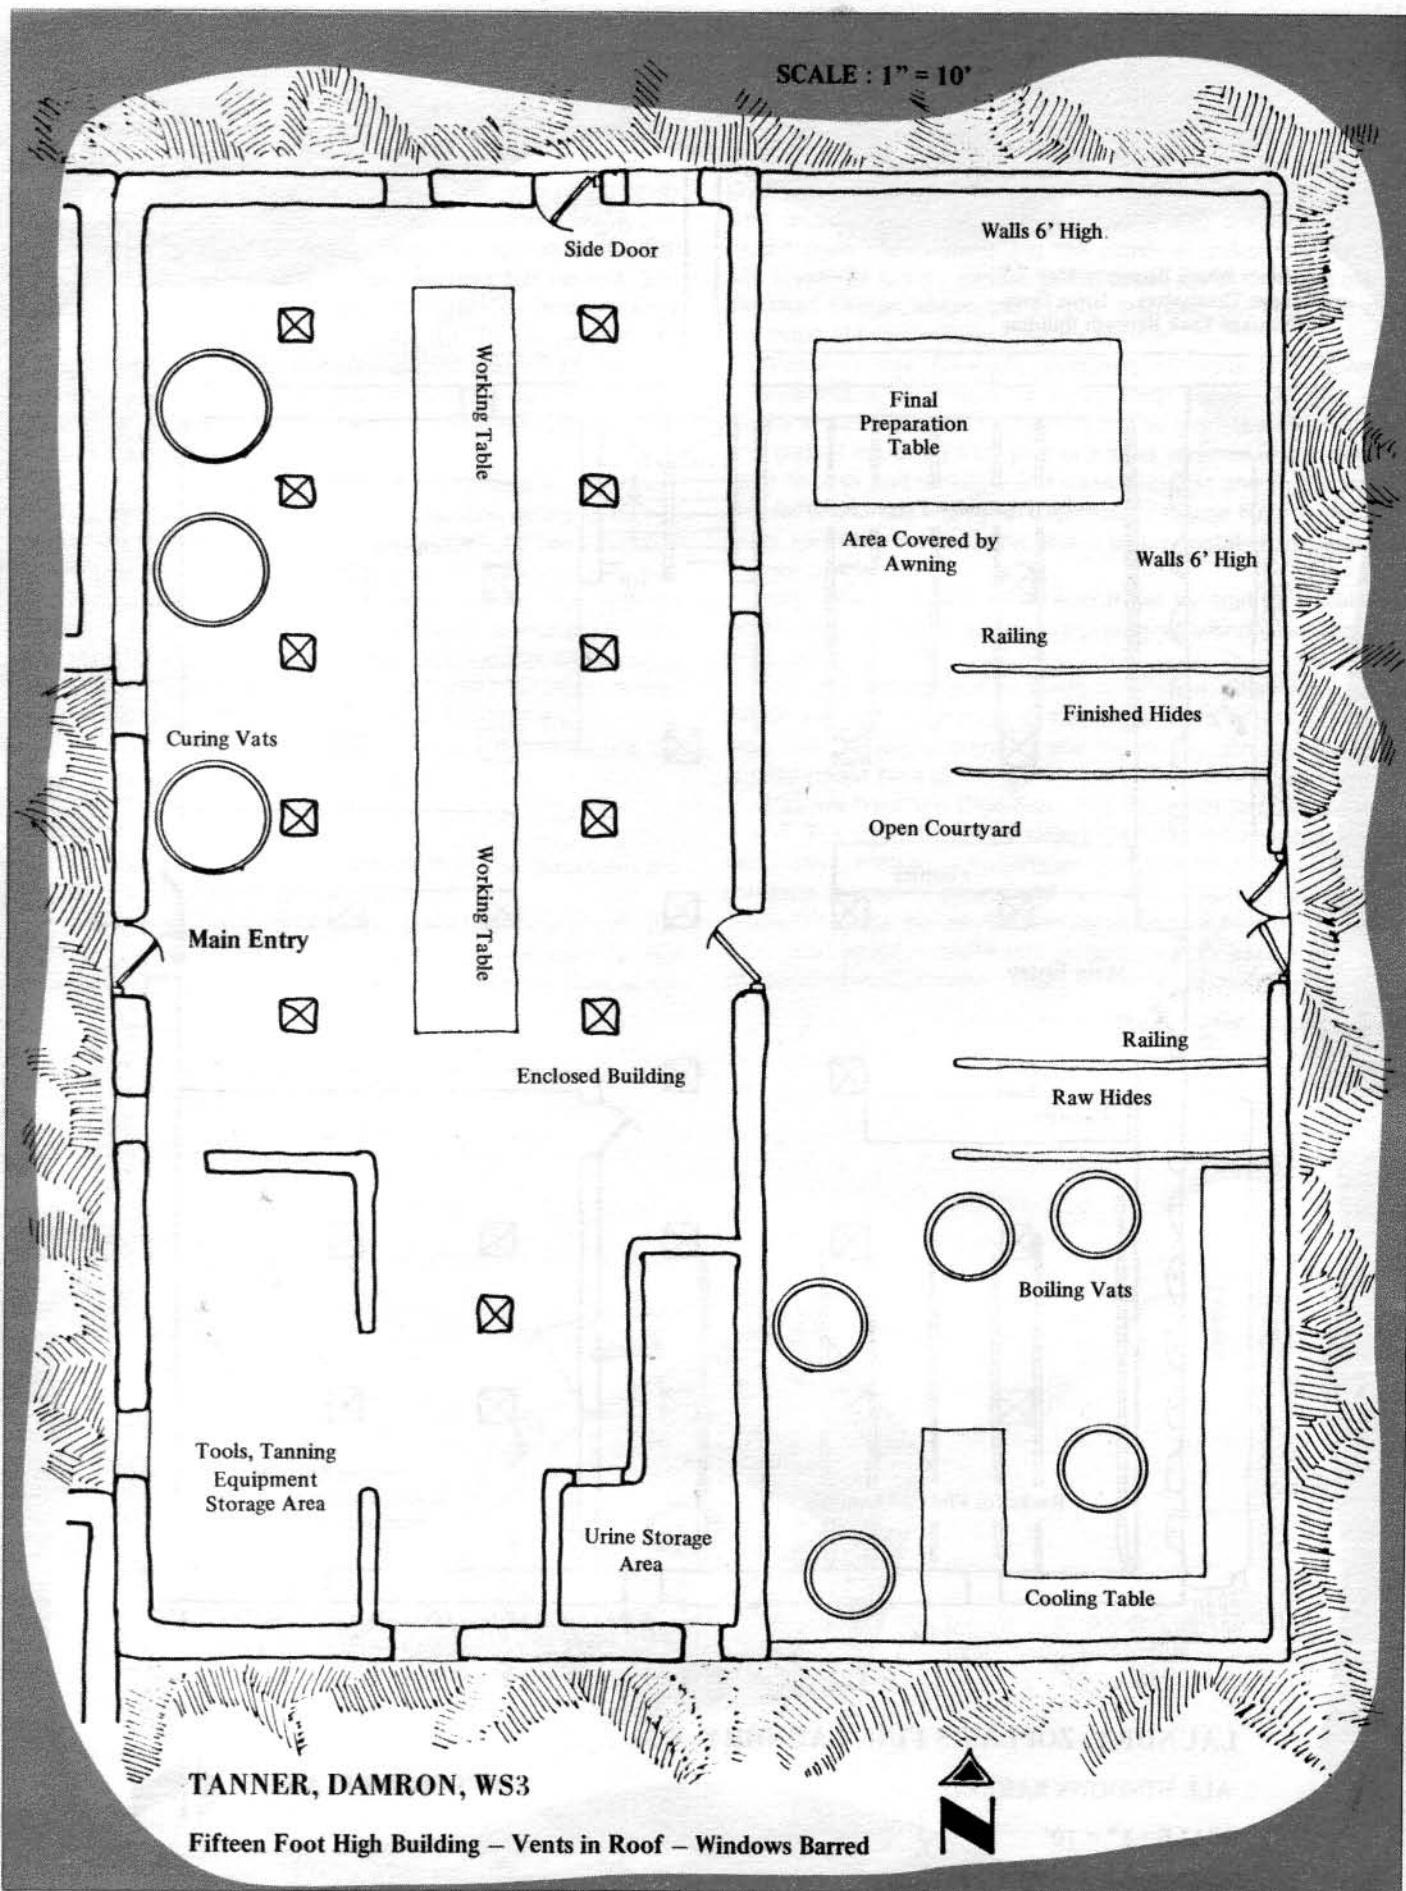

WS5 Laundry. Zoplay's Fine Laundry is the biggest laundry in Sanctuary. They will do anybody's laundry and while the quality is only so-so, they will try harder to do a better job if your bill is large. Zoplay is usually around keeping an eye on things and making sure no one is sneaking a quick nap under the laundry-covered drying racks. Zoplay is a nondescript kind of man—medium height, medium build, brown hair and eyes. He wears a large gold ring on his left hand. [Floorplan included.]

WS6 Perfumer. Carrigan Drumler oversees the perfume-making which goes on here along the Street of Smells. The perfumery is owned by the merchant Mikkum, who maintains a smaller shop in the Jeweler's Quarter where he sells the perfumes concocted here. Carrigan is well-known for his innovative methods and materials, which is why Mikkum put him in charge and why this perfumery fronts on the Street of Smells. In general, however, the odors coming from the perfumery, pungent and often strange as they may be, are vastly preferable to the odors of the open sewer. Because of this, Carrigan's old mother and his spinster sister maintain a tavern next door (see WS7), where patrons may eat their food with some relief from the stench of the area.

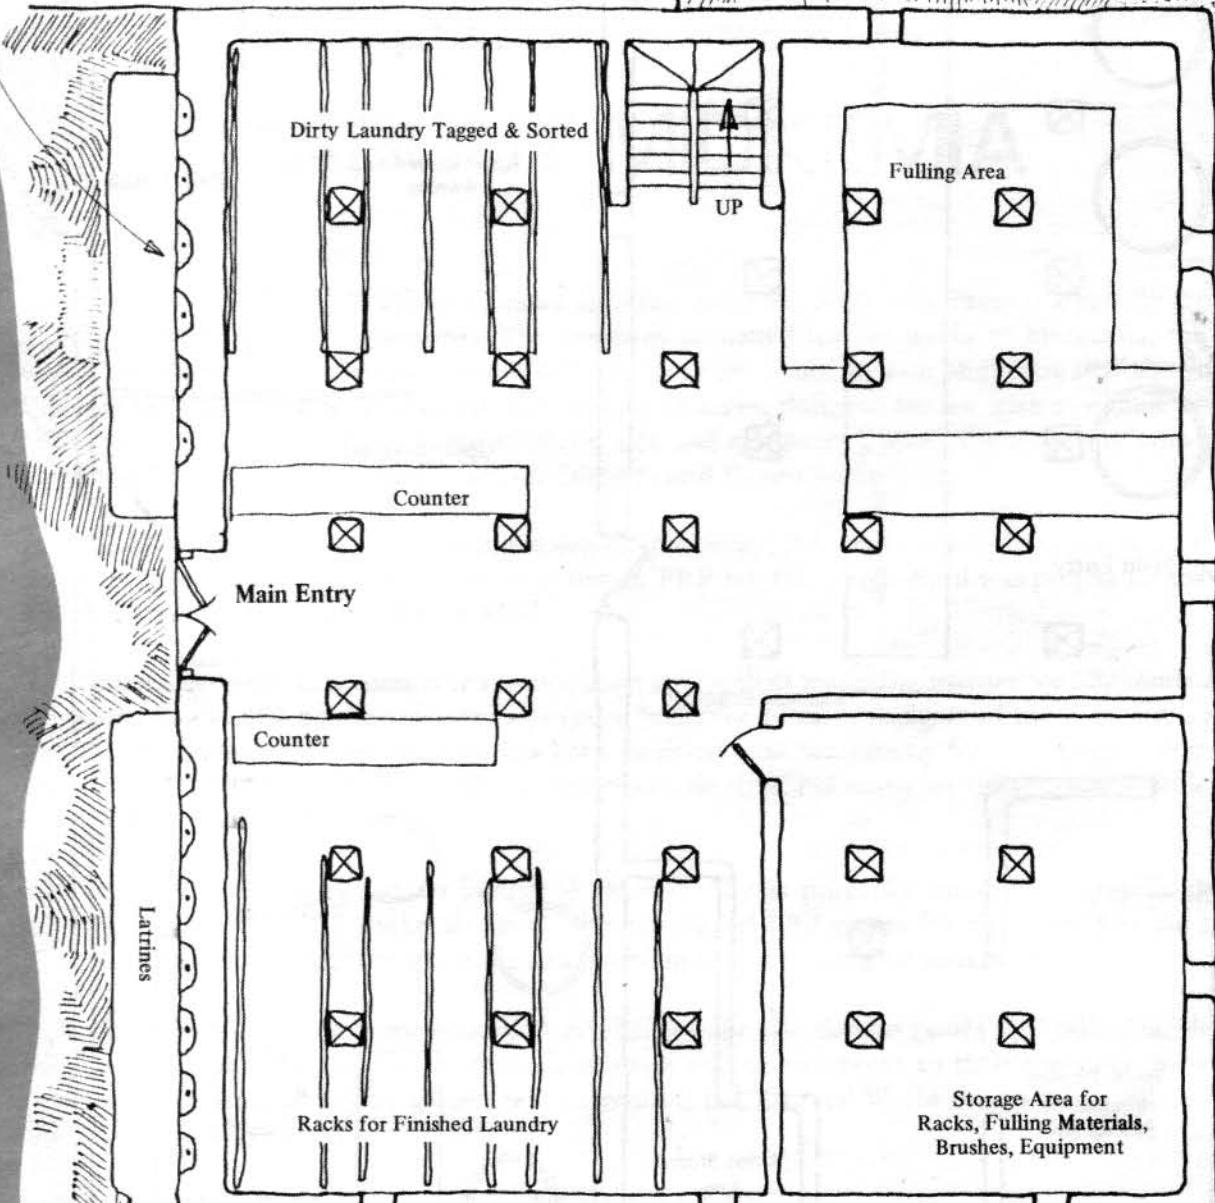

WS7 Tavern, Marta's Place. Old Marta and her aging daughter Rena, run a popular tavern in this section of town. This is not so much due to the food, which is average at best, or the rooms, which house more vermin than people, as it is due to the perfumery next door. At least here the air is usually bearable, even if not pleasant. The perfumery is overseen by Marta's son, Carrigan, who often uses Rena to try out new perfumes. No one has let Rena know one should use perfume sparingly, not bathe in it.

MZ1 Typical Apartment of the Maze. The layout of this apartment is duplicated throughout the city, but the Maze version is distinguished by being more cramped, and much more dirty. It may also have a collapsing roof, a door sagging on its hinges or missing altogether, and a pervasive smell made up of equal parts of the general effluvia of the Maze and the noxious aromas from the Westside businesses just outside the Maze. The apartment shown is ostentatious for the Maze, for it has an extra small room to use as a chamber pot closet, or clothes closet, or both. [Floorplan included.]

MZ2 The Vulgar Unicorn. This is the real hub of the Maze, though its location is not, in fact, at the geographical center. Anyone wanting a line on what's happening will come here, because everyone else does. Its proprietor, One-Thumb, has established a tradition of throwing out the obnoxious drunks and keeping the street people from bothering the patrons. Besides that, his upstairs rooms, while just as dingy and dirty and smelly as any other room in the Maze, actually have working doors and locks, and the special doors leading to the rooms are always kept locked. [Floorplan included.]

RL1 Gambling House. Cordileone's is one of many gambling houses on the Street of Red Lanterns. One of the larger houses (though by far not the largest), it offers a variety of games of skill and chance, including private gaming rooms. It looks fairly nice, inside and out, although it does not match the opulence of the larger houses on the street. Cordileone is a flashy dresser and knows most of the people in the room by first name. He is very friendly (as long as you spend money). Few fights occur on the floor, as the bouncers keep a close eye on things. Upon occasion things do get out of hand. [Floorplan included.]

RL2 Brothel. The Golden Lily is a relatively popular house run by the aging but still beautiful Amoli. She is looked upon with disdain and avoided by the other madames on the Street of Red Lanterns because she addicts her girls to krrf to hold them. She is also the only madame in the street who was not trained by Myrtis of Aphrodisia House, the leader of the brothel owners, and opposes Myrtis' leadership. Amoli is usually short of money because of the expense of the krrf, and is always alert for a new, cheaper source.

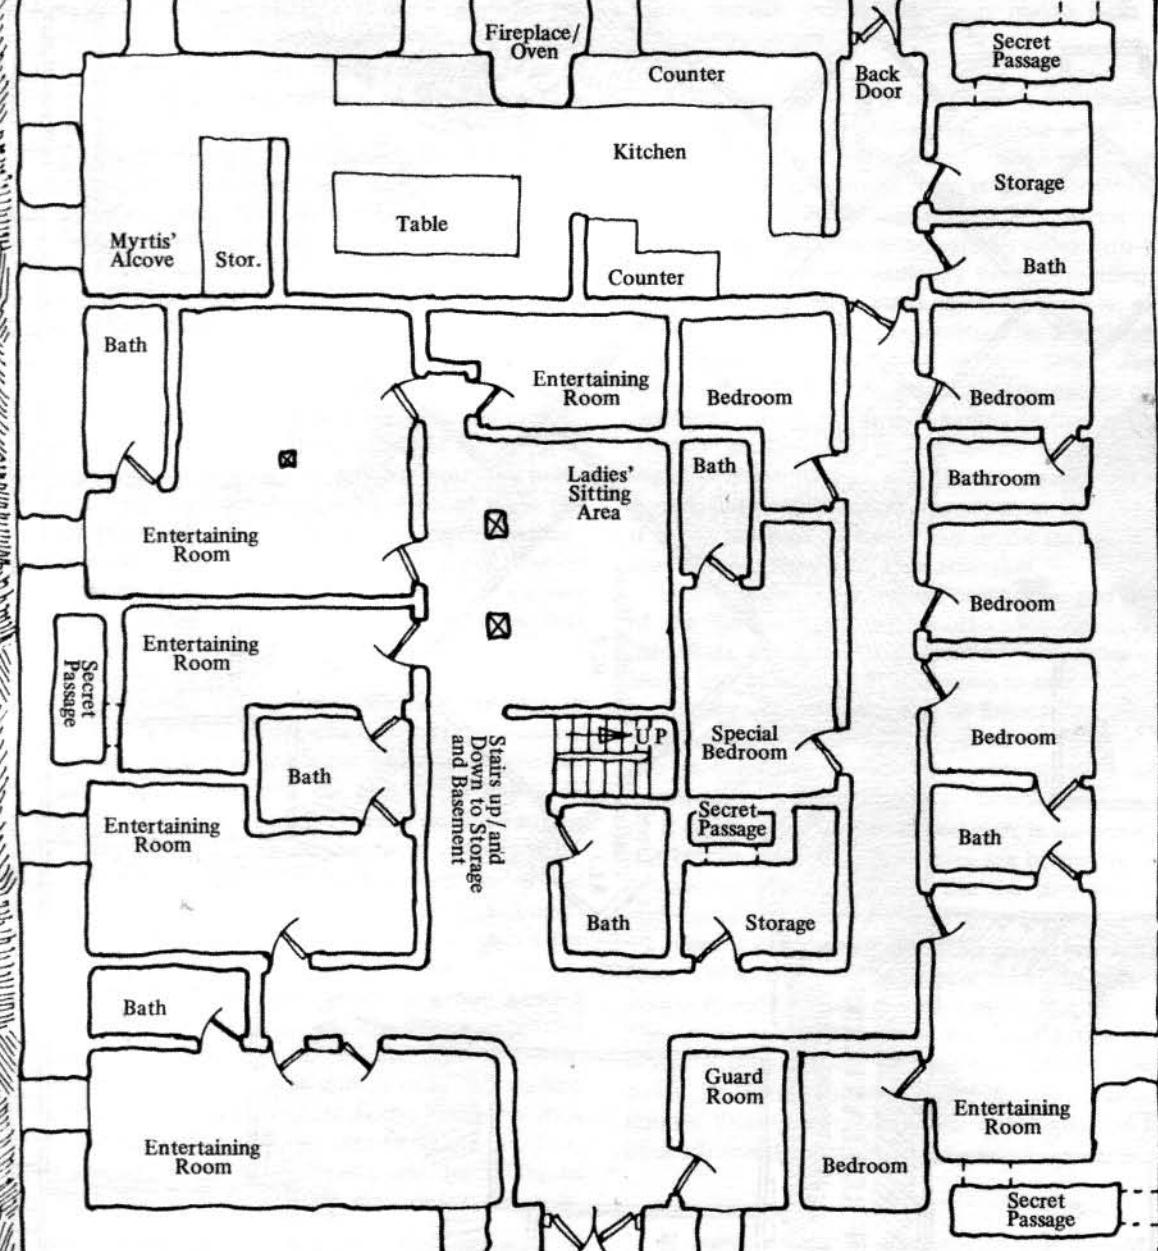

RL3 Leatherworker. Macwen Awlman runs this small shop on the Street of Red Lanterns. He specializes in the unusual leather products used by the houses on the street. His work is good, but he charges good money for leather-wrapped croupier's sticks, jeweled slippers, etc. Macwen is short, thin and balding. He is courteous, but will not reduce a price once his mind is made up.

RL4 Brothel, Aphrodisia House. This is the industry leader in the oldest profession in Sanctuary. Myrtis, the virtually ageless madame, has maintained its position in the marketplace since before Sanctuary became a part of Ili. Catering to the needs of the rich and famous, in the legendry of the city a "night in the Aphrodisia House is worth three years in Heaven." The Aphrodisia House is also the main entrance into the catacombs under the Street of Red Lanterns. [Floorplan included.]

RL5 Pawnshop. Garsten and his wife, Rosa, and their daughter, run the only honest pawnshop on the Street of Red Lanterns. Because of this, it is one of the smaller, less popular shops, for the rest have connections with the smugglers, the Cape Pirates and belong to the League of Changers. Garsten is almost fanatically protective of Rosa (who is very pretty) because of the businesses on the street.

THE BAZAAR

Except for the shanties along the three walls of the bazaar, all the booths in the bazaar are taken down each night at sundown and put up again every morning at false dawn. They are generally sturdy tents rigged into approximately 10' by 10' shapes and generally have one occupant/shopkeeper. The tent might be divided by a cloth partition, to give the occupant some privacy or shield the more valuable or illicit articles he has to sell.

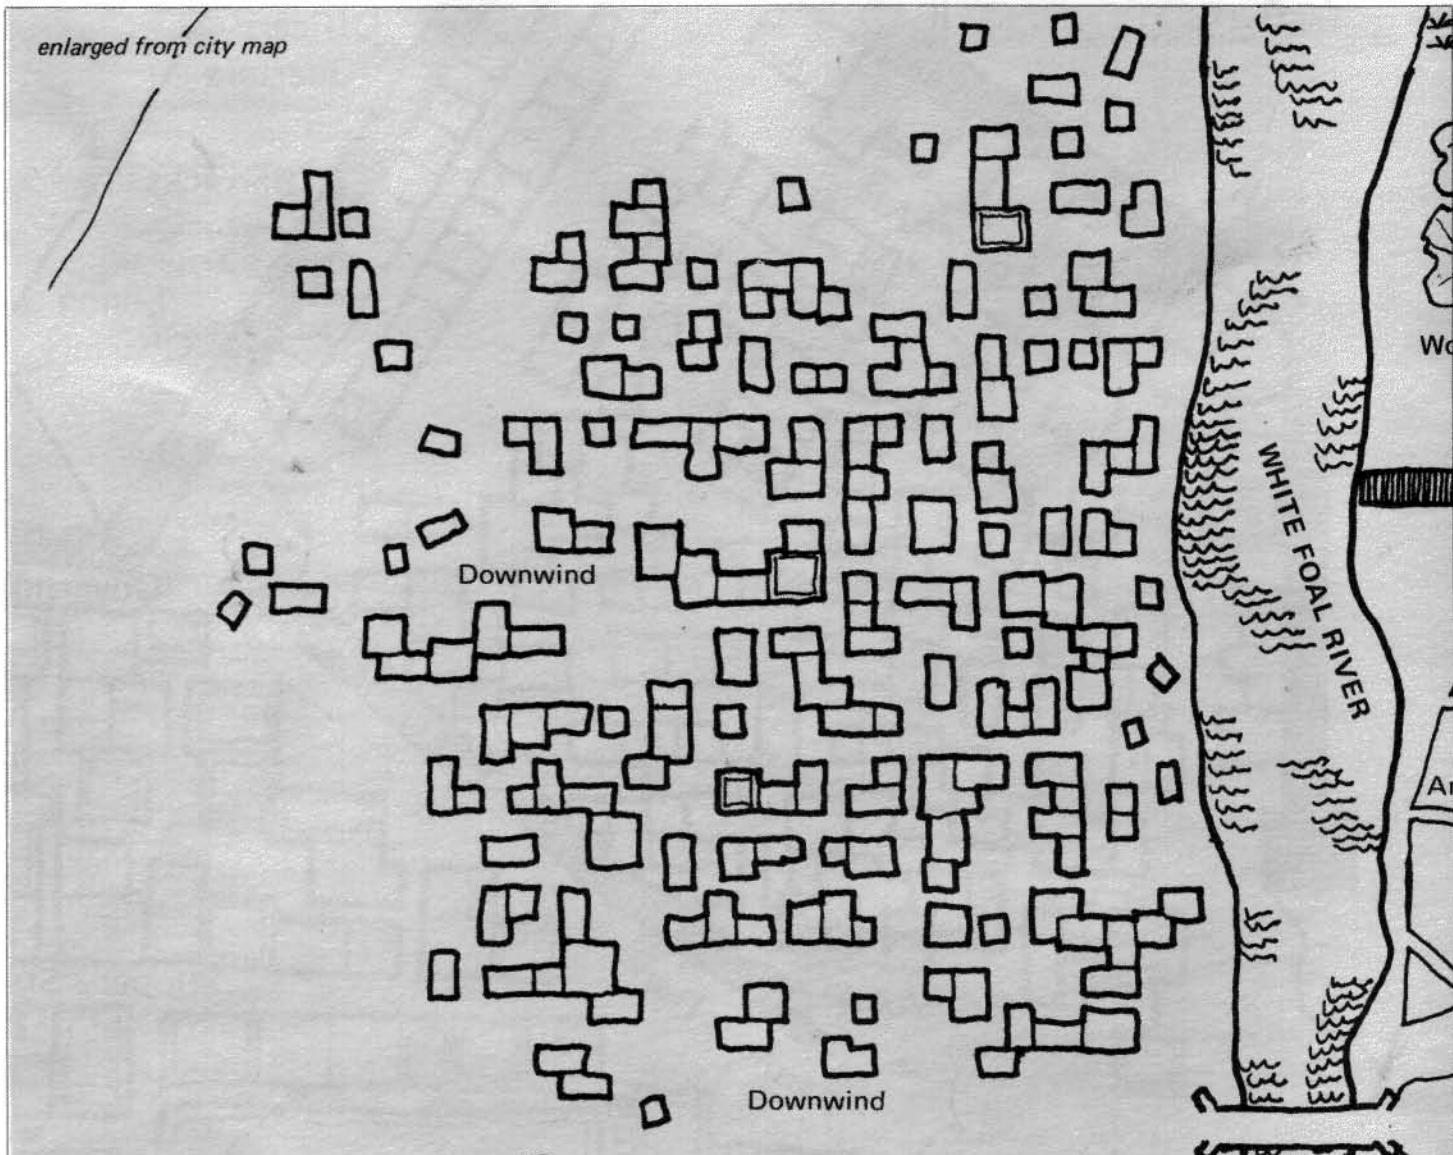

Some tents are open, allowing the public full access to closely examine the wares. Most are closed off with a board counter, and the interested shopper must indicate his choice to the keeper, who will bring it from a free-standing shelf in the back to be closely examined by the potential purchaser.

DOWNWIND

This is a rather stately hovel for Downwind. It is made from dried mud, rather than scrounged wood, and may have lasted through the last three or four fires relatively intact (although the owners probably didn't). The wall which attempts to separate the two parts of the hovel may be a later addition by an upwardly mobile Downwinder. If so, he's undoubtedly living in the Maze this very moment, climbing another step toward true respectability.

THE SEWERS OF SANCTUARY

When Sanctuary was founded, the town sewage ran down its streets into the bay or into the White Foal river. As the city grew, and more permanent buildings rose from the ruins of the mud and wattle hovels, the original street sewers became first central gutters and then covered gutters. When the Kingdom of IIsig conquered the town, engineers turned the gutter system into a full sewer system, marked as double lines on the accompanying map. During this renovation many old sewers were blocked off and circumvented, which started the original tunnels of the city's elaborate underground.

Neither gamemasters nor players should be misled by the existence of sewers: the streets of Sanctuary still run with offal and garbage. The street sewers feed into the sewer system every three or four blocks, and the offal must move through the streets to reach the sewers.

Goraddis Jarl, IIsig governor of Sanctuary 20 years before the Rankan invasion, originally conceived the full tunnel system as a means for surreptitious movement by defending troops. But Goraddis was removed from office for misappropriation of funds; his successors had no firm knowledge of the system when Ranke attacked.

The map shows the full extent of the system in the days of Goraddis Jarl. Details are not exact. Every tunnel has another tunnel paralleling it, weaving around it, or feeding into it in any given hundred foot section.

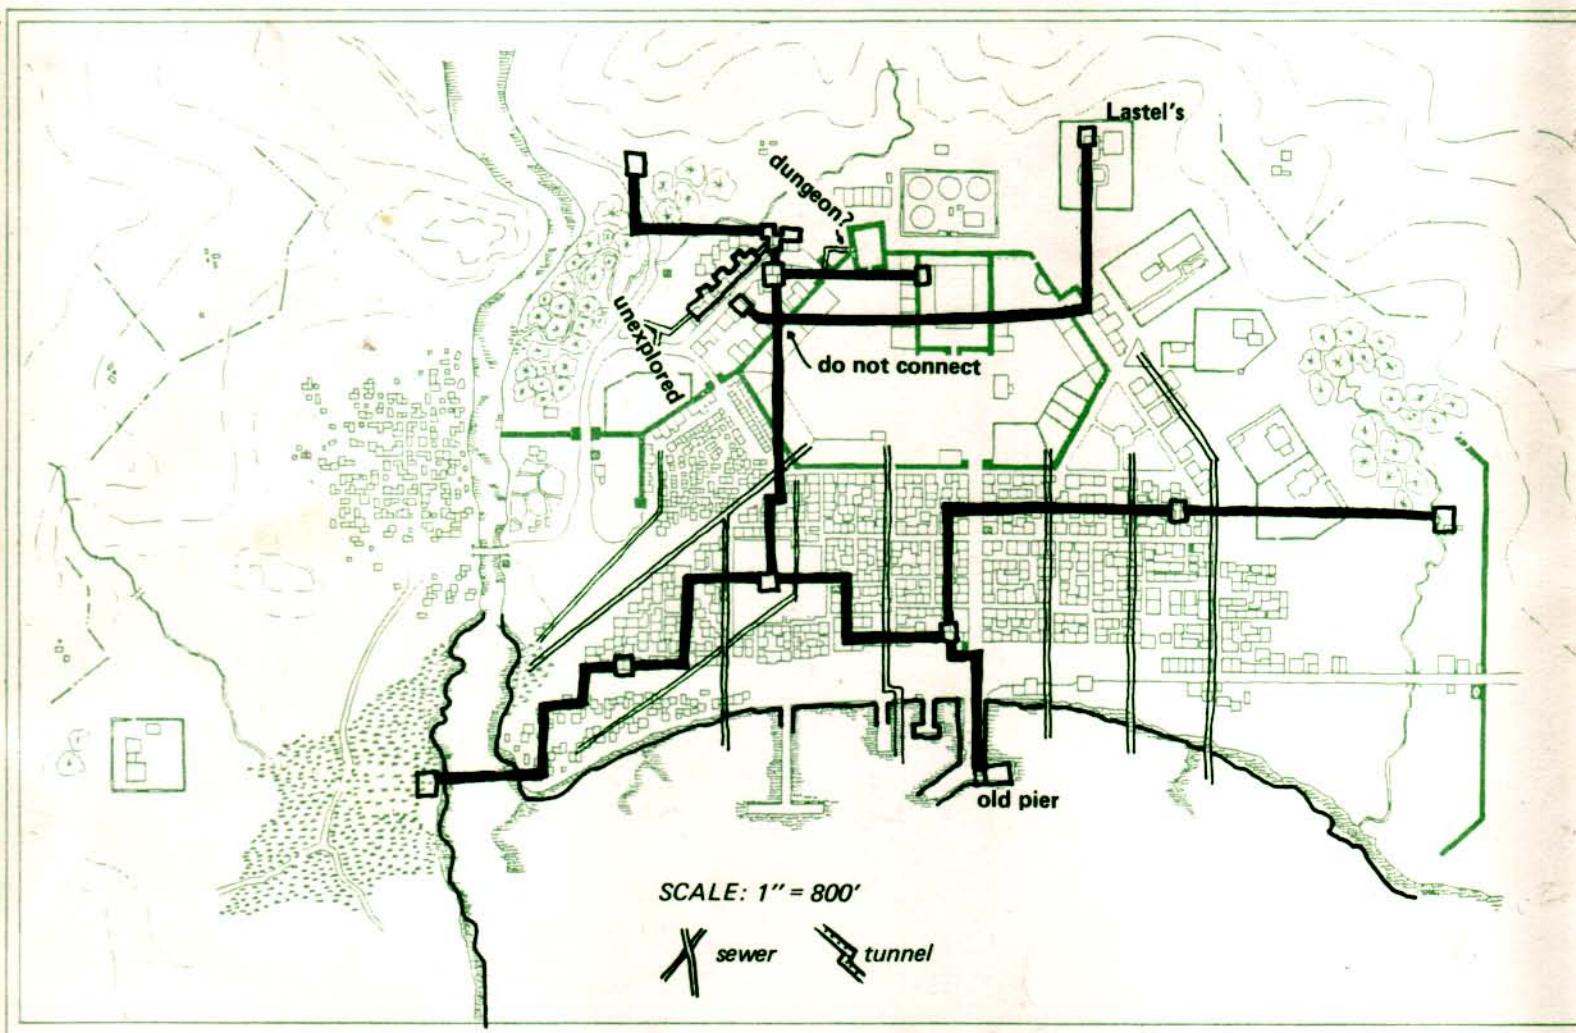

Since the Rankan conquest, more elements of the system have been blocked off or altered. Only one of these changes is shown on the map: the tunnel which now connects the villa of Lastel with the Lily Garden has been isolated from the rest of the network by the magics of Lythande.

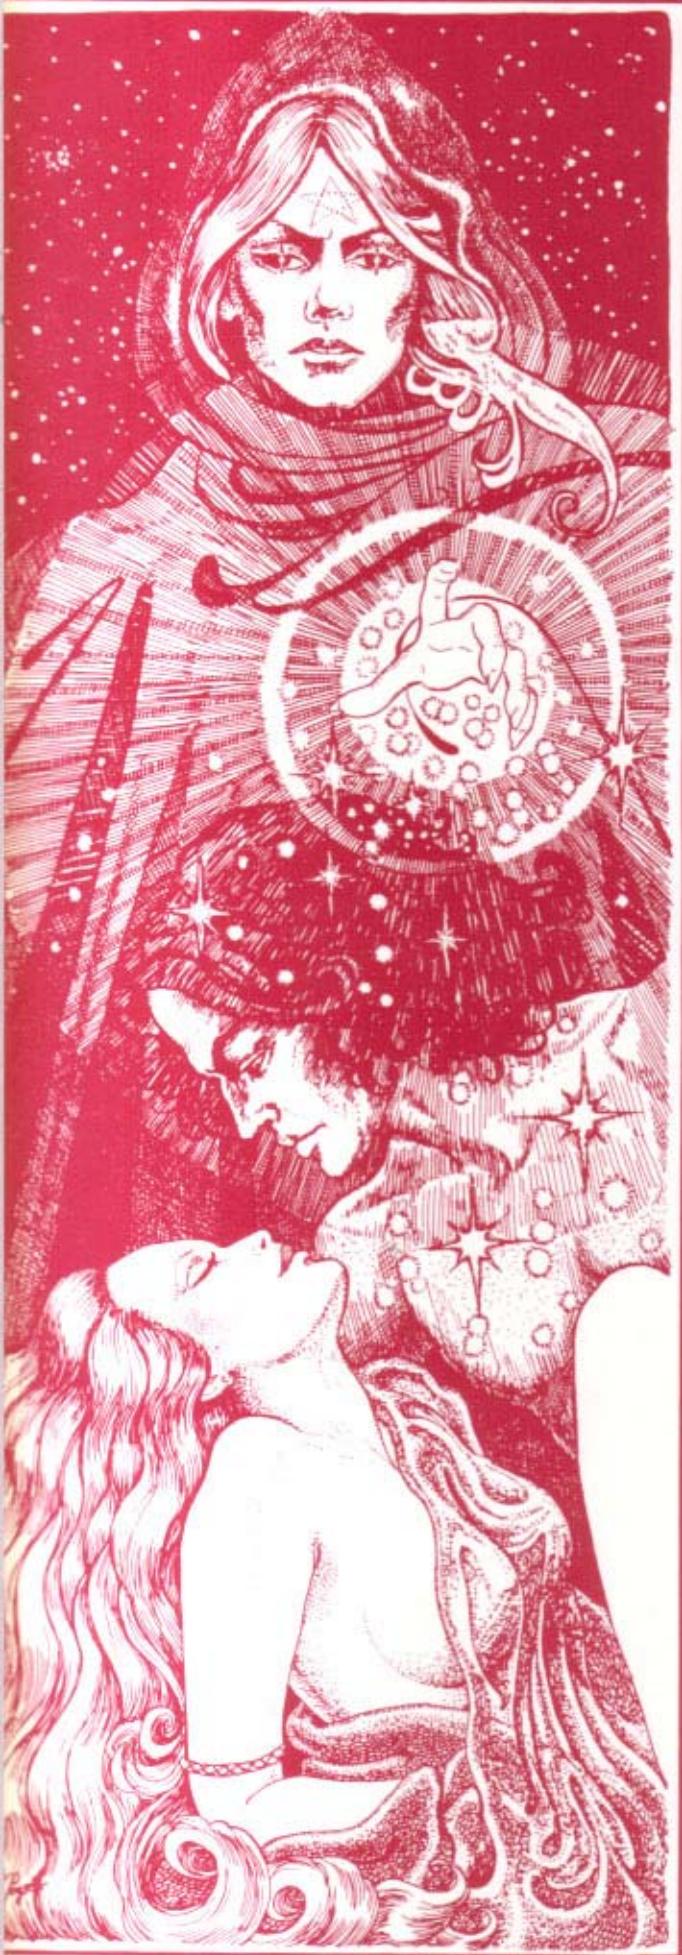

According to Myrtis' testimony to Zalbar, all other tunnels still interconnect—but this may be wishful thinking. All that can be said for sure is that the catacombs under the Street of Red Lanterns connect with the Governor's Palace and with the watch post on the White Foal river. Kadakithis barely realizes that the tunnels exist, and no attempt thusfar has been made to chart the system.

Gamemasters should note that the tunnels and sewers interconnect, and that some of the tunnel blockages and sewer back-ups come from overflows among these interconnections. See the map of the Maze Underground to appreciate just how the interconnections develop.

After trial and travail, player-characters may find the above map in the private vault of Myrtis, in the library of Enas Yorl, in the memory of Lythande, in Melilot's Scriptorium (in a recently-bought pile of scrolls which Melilot has yet to examine), and in Jubal's private library. Each version differs, and has many hand-made corrections. Many fraudulent versions are for sale in the Maze and elsewhere.

As an art, role-playing today perhaps most resembles music. The game designers are like composers, the game masters are like conductors, and the players are the members of the group whose music (actions) will make a symphony or a cacophony of the game. Fortunately, no game master is actually burdened with a hundred players—it is easier for a trio or quartet to reach satisfying harmonies.

With this Adventure Pack those harmonies should be reached quickly, for the Thieves' World anthology series provides a perfect setting for adventurers, and the anthologies are themselves the cross-fertilized products of a joint venture very similar to that of role-playing. We have striven to make useful every part of this Adventure Pack, and to make every useful part available.

Role-playing games are a cooperative and creative group effort. Many different points of view are blended together simultaneously, and imaginative experience is truly shared.

I would like to point out the people who deserve special thanks for their parts.

Bob Asprin and Lynn Abbey were very cooperative in lending their pet project to our mercies. We solicited additional writings from other contributors in order to flesh out details we felt important for role-playing, but which were not important for the stories (yet).

For instance, it was vital to have detailed descriptions for the city and its parts. Most of this work was done by Midkemia Press. That company is a pair of husband/wife teams who are writers, scholars, and gamers, and whose professionalism is apparent in what they do. Not only have they done much to make life in Sanctuary understandable and fun to play, but they also met their deadline with precision (editors reading this will appreciate the point). April and Steve Abrams did most of the city and area work, while Anita and Jon Everson did most of the interior detail work. Yurek Chodak is responsible for addition details and the plan of the Vulgar Unicorn, the Aphrodesia House, the sub-continent map, and several more.

The nine designers each are expert in the system to which they contributed. Five of the nine were the original designers of the respective systems! Each made many suggestions contributing to the fullness of the Adventure Pack.

Designers of other systems were invited to contribute, but either failed to supply stand-ins to do the work when they could not, or else failed to meet the deadline. Some game systems were ignored because of anachronistic difficulties, or because the system was relatively unknown at the time of invitation. We hope to update Thieves' World with new systems as appropriate over the years to come.

Eight companies besides Chaosium Inc. contributed to the project. To the observer who thumbs through these books, company participation may seem passive and unimportant, but each organization made efforts on behalf of this supplement beyond what could be expected.

Thieves' World has given me a good feeling from its conception to its completion. I hope some of that is conveyed to you as well.

—Greg Stafford

PERSONALITY SKETCHES

Steve Perrin
Midkemia Press

The following list of general descriptions features major personalities from THIEVES' WORLD and TALES FROM THE VULGAR UNICORN. Many of the great and powerful of Sanctuary are passed by, simply because they have not been sufficiently described in the anthologies to give our contributors a handle on how to describe them in any game system. Most of these personalities are in the minor characters list following these thumbnail descriptions of the major characters. The Minor Characters list gives names and short descriptions of occupation or significance; we leave it to your active imaginations to flesh them out for your particular system.

Some of the major personalities listed die or otherwise depart Sanctuary in the course of the stories featuring them. They have been described because you, the gamesmaster, may prefer to be unhindered in either simulating the stories or changing the history of Sanctuary. Bourne might not be killed by the Prince, Masha might have to stay in Sanctuary, Smhee might survive, etc.

The Major Characters are in alphabetical order, as arranged in three groups.

THE PRINCE, RETINUE, and OTHER RANKING OFFICIALS

Arman the Hell Hound — Arman is an arrogant younger son of a poor noble who did not have the temperament to become an officer. As a Hell Hound, he is the sort of policeman whose prisoners often die 'trying to escape, or are injured 'resisting arrest.' He follows Zalbar's orders with a calculated insolence just short of insubordination. Paradoxically, he is incredibly impressed with the Prince and willing to die for him. Arman is slim and wiry, with the distinctive Rankan nose he likes to look down.

—Robert Asprin, various stories, both volumes

Bourne — a large brown-haired man with a bushy beard and mustache; he is one of the Hell Hounds who stayed in Sanctuary with the others, but more ambitious to raise his social position. This led him into political intrigue against the Prince. His role in the intrigue was discovered with the help of Hansie Shadowspawn, and Bourne was removed as a Hell Hound. He can be used as a subversive against the Prince (having escaped his death as a traitor) or a Hell Hound (having been reinstated).

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Captain Aye-Gophlan — a local boy who made good by becoming an officer in the Rankan military guarding Sanctuary. As such, he is well below the Hell Hounds in rank and still retains most of the thief skills which brought him his commission. His post is the guard post at the corner of Processional Way (PR6). He is a seasoned veteran and quite loyal to the Prince because of his loyalty to the Empire. Aye-Gophlan is tall and burly, but running to seed. His pay is so low that he can only afford military dress, not civilian, so he will be found in armor whether on duty or not.

—John Brunner, 'Sentences of Death,' TW

Danlis — the daughter of a high born but poor nobleman and acts as lady-in-waiting and confidante/ancilla to Lady Rosanda, Molin Torchholder's wife. She is quite intelligent and loves to manipulate other's lives. Whenever possible, she acts to manipulate Molin, who is mostly unaware of her machinations, being thoroughly conditioned to believe in Rankan male supremacy. Danlis is tall and slender, the cold perfection of her features and alabaster skin belied by the grey eyes and golden hair.

—Poul Anderson, 'Gate of Flying Knives,' TW

Prince Kadakithis, Imperial Governor of Sanctuary — is slim, in his late teens, idealistic and enthusiastic. He is also intelligent and has excellent awareness of why he is where he is. He is quite fair, when it is possible. The Prince was given the nickname of Kittycat by those contemptuous of his diplomatic rather than tyrannical ways. His wife has sadistic tendencies, so he maintains several concubines as well.

—Robert Asprin, various stories, both volumes

Molin Torchholder — the high priest and temple architect of Savankala who was sent to Sanctuary with the Prince's retinue to build 'suitable' temples to the Rankan gods. He originally intended the new temples to surpass the Iisig temples but due to various events he decreased his ambitions. He is extremely powerful, rich and dedicated to the glory of his pantheon. Molin is the perfect square-jawed, long nosed Rankan bureaucrat/priest.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Face of Chaos,' TW

Quag — the oldest of the Hell Hounds and the most stolid. He follows orders as best he can and is best at jobs which do not need an active imagination. He is heavy-set and unlikely to meet a difficulty with anything more subtle than a drawn sword.

—Robert Asprin, various stories, both volumes

The first group is the Prince and his Retinue and Officials. These are the invading Rankans who inhabit the Governor's Palace, plus a few city functionaries like Captain of the Guard Aye-Gophlan. These are the people you will meet if you move in government circles or run afoul of the law.

The second group is the residents of Sanctuary, the citizens and denizens who make up the majority of the picturesque population of Thieves' World. From such stalwart citizens as Melilot to the dregs of Jubal, they're all here. Also included in most of the descriptions is a generic description of Jubal's henchlings, the Hawkmask.

The third group is the transients, the passersby who may or may not be in Sanctuary at any given time. Among them are Cappen Varra and Lythande, as well as caravan master Samlor hil Samt.

The Minor Characters list is strictly alphabetical. Note as well that the character names have not been put in bold type.

Razkuli — the youngest of the Hell Hounds and an ardent follower of Zalbar. Both have an immediate answer for all obstructions, the sword. Zalbar's position of responsibility has tempered him, but Razkuli is impulsively violent. He is dark, slim, and very quick, and is particularly proud of his skills as an archer.

—Robert Asprin, 'To Guard the Guardians,' VU

Tempus Thales — the newest Hell Hound and an enigmatic character dedicated to the Rankan god of war, Vashanka. He has been pledged to the god and can sometimes speak to Vashanka, usually to quarrel. He has been alive for at least three centuries, is a master of all weapons and was granted two gifts by the god—the ability to regenerate and the ability to mask his features so that he cannot be recognized. He hates Jubal the slaver and hunts Jubal's hawkmask wherever he may find them. Even outside of Sanctuary, he despises all magicians. Because Tempus was sent to Sanctuary on a special commission by powerful interests in the capital, Zalbar has very little control over him. Tempus is 6½ feet tall and brutal-looking when he is not masking his features. Normally he has long blonde hair.

—Janet Morris, 'Vashanka's Minion,' VU

Walegrin the Mercenary — half-brother to Illyra the seeress. They both had the same father, a Rankan soldier who was cursed by the S'Danzo for seducing a S'Danzo woman. Walegrin feels himself cursed by the same curse and his luck is rarely better than 50/50, good and bad, even though Illyra feels this is nonsense. Walegrin is now wanted for deserting his post, but this may change when the results for his hunt for the formula for Enlibar steel become known. There is no trace of youth left in his features. He is tall and pale, his thick, sun-bleached hair braided into four braids bound by a bronze circlet. He cuts a very barbaric figure, and usually has at least one of his mercenary company with him.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Zalbar — captain of the Hell Hounds and a dedicated soldier with nothing but disdain for the city of Sanctuary and its citizens. He is scrupulously honest, not even letting his magically-induced love for Myrtis (see Residents) sway his judgments too far. Zalbar's square-jawed face underlines his honesty, and his height makes him well known, even among the uniformed Hell Hounds. Even Tempus is no taller.

—Robert Asprin, various stories, both volumes

RESIDENTS

Alten Stulwig — an apothecary, a physician-healer with a shop at WS2. He is not exactly an alchemist, for his knowledge is of plants, not of magical potions. He can be relied on for medical advice and most forms of drugs and poison antidotes. He doesn't mention his poison trade and will often attempt to have pretty matrons of the city pay him for his work with their favors rather than their money. Alten is about 35, of average looks. He is distinguishable on the street by his healer's tunic and the staff he bears, now charred about the tip.

—A.E. Van Vogt, 'The Dream of the Sorceress,' VU

Amoli — Mistress of the Golden Lily (Lily Garden) the second most powerful madam on the Street of Red Lanterns and the only contender for Myrtis' leadership. She keeps her girls dependent on her through their addiction to krrf an expensive drug. She also, is addicted. This often leads her into contact with fairly rough types, since the drug is not easily obtained in any quantity. She is quick to correct anyone confusing her place with the Slippery Lily, a hellhole inside the Maze itself. Rumor has it that she actually owns both establishments, sending her broken-down girls to the Slippery Lily when they no longer meet the standards of the Lily Garden. Though in a tough trade and over 40, she has managed to keep much of her hardened beauty. Her major weaknesses are her addiction and a concern for respect. Threatening either will be met with immediate violence, supporting either will gain her assistance.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Dubro — the quiet, huge smith of the Bazaar who protects ILLYRA and does most of the repair work for the poor in the area. He has little opportunity for combat because he is so obviously big and strong that no one wants to fight him. He specializes in wheelrims, horseshoeing and housewares, but can repair weapons if necessary.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Face of Chaos,' TW; 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Enas Yorl — considered by some to be one of the three most powerful magicians in the Rankan Empire. He can only be identified by his red, glowing eyes, since he is under a curse which causes him to change shape at unknown but fairly frequent intervals (some say once or more a day). He is seen only in voluminous robes and is a good source of information regarding anything in Sanctuary he's interested in. He has been alive for centuries and is not a fighter but is very quick with his spells. He lives in a palatial residence below Pyrtanis Street in the Jeweler's Quarter. It is reported to be guarded by Basilisks.

—John Brunner, 'Sentences of Death,' TW

Hakiem — the storyteller is an excellent storyteller, a master of his craft. Old and wizened, he is not a threat to anyone and is universally tolerated, at least in the Bazaar and the poorer areas of the city. However, as his employer JUBAL points out, people often forget that one who talks so much can also hear, making Hakiem a valuable spy. He frequents the Bazaar, selling his stories for coppers to whomever will listen. He can also be found at the large wharf when he is not chased off by the fishermen, who think he steals.

—Robert Asprin, 'Hakiem's Tale,' TW and others

Hanse Shadowspawn — a young, superbly skillful thief, often seen in the Maze. He is of average height, is wiry and has dark hair and eyes. He always dresses in dark clothing and has a half-dozen or more weapons squirrelled about his body. A master skulker and slitherer, he can rob from the most vigilant without being caught, but will not fight unless forced to.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW; 'Shadows Pawn,' VU

Illyra — a half-S'Danzo seeress and diviner. Her magic only reads the past and future, and she has no other magical abilities. She is young and something of an outcast because the other locals don't trust the S'Danzo gypsies and the S'Danzo don't trust the half-breeds. She seems to have inherited the S'Danzo scrying abilities in full. Her divinations always give indications of the future but not absolute predictions. She is the only known S'Danzo who can accurately predict the near-future. She works in the Bazaar and lives with Dubro the smith. She never goes out in public without the heavy makeup and voluminous skirts of a S'Danzo crone, but she is actually young, lithe and vibrant. She is dark-haired and swarthy-skinned like all S'Danzo.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Face of Chaos,' TW; 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Hawkmasks — Jubal's strongarm crew of conscienceless mercenaries is responsible for much of his power in Sanctuary. These men and women wear blue hawkmasks when on business so that they cannot be positively identified. They are well-paid, are the finest sellswords Jubal's money can buy, and their morale is high. The average citizen (or even city guardsman) steps aside when a hawkmask swaggers by.

Jubal — black-skinned master of the criminal world of Sanctuary, former slave and gladiator. He is master of almost any common weapon and a few that are not so common. Jubal rose from being an extraordinary if common thief to master of nearly all the illegal and a few legal activities in Sanctuary. He maintains a force of cutthroats hidden in blue hawk masks to do his dirty-work. They are referred to as the Blue Hawks or Hawkmask. Although almost fifty years old, he is still a match for almost anyone in a fight and is willing to do his own work if need be. He is the unofficial Mayor of Sanctuary, and maintains an extensive network of spies throughout the city. He is the major krrf supplier for Amoli. One of the few blacks in Sanctuary, his massive height and worldly bearing would set him apart in a similarly hued crowd.

—Robert Asprin, 'The Price of Doing Business,' TW; 'To Guard the Guardians,' VU

Kemren the Purple Mage — a very powerful mage originally from Sharranip, who lives (although many now say he's dead) on the island of Shugthee in the White Foal River west of Sanctuary. His massive treasure is accessible only through hidden paths guarded by giant bengal crabs, giant poisonous spiders whose venom has no known antidote, and other nasty monsters. Many claim to have methods or maps for gaining entrance, but few, if any, do. He is never seen in Sanctuary. All of his contacts are through his savage Raggah servants.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage,' VU

Kurd — the vivisectionist. An immigrant from Ranke, driven out of there by Zalbar the Hell Hound, who took offense to his use of slaves for his experiments. He is a man of vision and, lacking modern equipment, simply cuts people apart to see how they tick, all with the ostensive goal of furthering medical knowledge. Kurd is about fifty, his cadaverous body shows the neglect in clothes and grooming of a man dedicated to his avocation; his skeletal fingers have a quick dexterity.

—Robert Asprin, 'To Guard the Guardians,' VU

Masha zel-Inee — a short, wiry woman, a good midwife who resents having to pay half her fee to a doctor who sits in the outside room and gives advice if anything goes wrong. She also makes false teeth and jewelery. Masha lives in the Maze with her mother Wallu, her ever-drunk husband Eevroen, and her two little girls, Kheem and Handoo. Originally, her parents were fairly affluent merchants, but they went broke when the caravans stopped coming to Sanctuary regularly and Masha sank to the level she is now in. She has managed to keep her higher-class good looks throughout her downfall.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage,' VU

Master Melilot — a fat, dark, greasy eunuch specializing in forgery, blackmail and translations. By blackmail and deceit, he has become the foremost scribe in the city, making his own paper and employing some score of translators who can translate all known tongues. Thanks to previous services rendered the Governor, he is also scribe by appointment to the Governor of Sanctuary. His scriptorium is located at PR1.

—John Brunner, 'Sentences of Death,' TW

Mizraith — one of the most powerful mages in Sanctuary. He is an old man who rarely ventures from his home. He is amoral by society's standards, but will make deals and usually keep them. Mizraith depends on long, semi-permanent spells and curses, which he maintains by tapping the powers of lesser mages. He has three sons, Stefab, Nesteph, Marype, whom he's training in the family business. Marype, however is the youngest and chafes at the pace of training. He is covertly dealing with Mizraith's main rival, Markmor.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Myrtis — the most powerful madame on the Street of Red Lanterns and its uncrowned Queen. She runs the Aphrodisia House, the classiest bordello in Sanctuary. She is as old as LYTHANDE and is kept young through Lythande's arts. The only sign of her age is her grey hair. She is very protective of her girls, particularly the younger ones who are not yet working in rooms. Myrtis no longer sleeps with her customers, except perhaps once with Zalbar the Hell Hound. She is also the mistress of the tunnels which run beneath the walls of Sanctuary.

—Christine DeWees, 'Myrtis,' TW
Marion Zimmer Bradley, The Secret of the Blue Star, TW

One-Thumb — the proprietor of the Vulgar Unicorn, a rowdy and popular tavern located in the middle of the Maze, across from the ruins of Heqt's temple. One-Thumb is a large, heavy man whose lack of half a thumb gave rise to his name. He leads a double life, unknown to any but Mizraith (see above, Mizraith maintains a spell on One-Thumb that will cause anyone killing him to burn for eternity). As Lastel, his alter-ego, he maintains a very rich residence above the Jeweler's Quarter, which connects by tunnels with the Lily Garden (also called the Golden Lily) run by Amoli (see above). As Lastel, he socializes and connives with the wealthy merchants of Sanctuary; as One-Thumb, he keeps an eye on the doings of the lower-classes. He often supplies Amoli with the krrf she needs and deals in other illegalities, including occasional assassinations.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

TRANSIENTS

Cappen Varra — the minstrel is known (some say jokingly) as the 'only honest man in Sanctuary.' He is slim and wiry, with long dark hair and blue eyes, a romantic lad attempting to find his fortune without spending too much effort to maintain it. His poetry and music are his greatest skills but his rapier is not to be sneered at. He has also been gifted with an amulet which may give him protection against magic if he can say three truths about the originator of the magic. Sanctuary has a strange attraction for Cappen, and he will often leave, only to return several months later. He is originally from the city of Caronne, and has as big a weakness for beautiful women as they do for him. He is a good minstrel, but would rather flirt than work. He is a drinking buddy of JAMIE THE RED.

—Poul Anderson, 'Gate of Flying Knives', TW

Cime — the harlot assassin, has old grey eyes, a figure thickening a touch past youth, and silver shot hair. She is the sister/lover of TEMPUS. Once they were young and in love. Then gods and archmages and vengeance rode into their lives and for over a hundred years they have been without love, he in the service of a god and she in that of revenge. Cime is bound by a vow. Her secret is that she may own no debts and take nothing except she pay for it. Her sole goal in life is to slay sorcerers. That is all she does. She would love Tempus again but believes they have hurt past love and that his god has damned him.

—Janet Morris, 'Vashanka's Minion', VU

Jamie the Red — is a tall, square shouldered, nordic barbarian from the Northern Mountains, whose hair gave rise to his nickname. He maintains an apartment in the Jeweler's Quarter where his two women live (of whom he is quite jealous). He is usually ready for a brawl or a drink, depending on his mood. Although appearing initially dumb, he has some education from the court of the mountain king, his father. His rank at home is equivalent to Highland Chief.

—Poul Anderson from a description by Gordon Dickson, 'Gate of Flying Knives', TW

Jarveena — of Forgotten Holt, a thin dark-haired girl with many visible and some invisible scars, who worked for MASTER MELILOT when she first came to Sanctuary. Her younger years were spent seeking revenge on those who sacked and burned her home in the village of Holt. This she found with the help of ENAS YORL. She is a bright girl with a quick wit and a realistic view of the world. She now acts as a roving representative of Master Melilot and other Sanctuarian merchants.

—John Brunner, 'Sentences of Death,' TW

Lythande — a tall, slender, grey-haired priest of the Sect of the Blue Star. She rarely uses her powers openly but is capable of any known magic through the use of the blue star tattooed on her forehead. She must hide the fact that she is female, for if anyone discovers the fact, her power becomes theirs. She has sworn never to eat or drink in front of men and substitutes smoking tobacco, marijuana, or whatever else instead.

—Marion Zimmer Bradley, 'The Secret of the Blue Star,' TW

Samlor hil Samt — a merchant with the tricky profession of caravan master. During his career he has become a first-rate fighter and minor magician. He is relatively honest and totally ruthless. He travels to Sanctuary only rarely, preferring to ply the more profitable caravan route through the mountains. Samlor is broadfaced, broadly built, and pale, perpetually sunburned and never tanning.

—David Drake, 'Goddess,' VU

Smhee — a minor priest of the foreign goddess, Weda Krishtawn, seeking the PURPLE MAGE for forsaking the goddess. He is easily recognized by his stench, which is due to the rancid butter covering his entire body (a religious rite). He is a short man with thin arms and legs, but a butterball of a body. He can be found almost anywhere in Sanctuary, usually surrounded by people rapidly moving away from him! Smhee's real name, totally unknown in Sanctuary is Rhandee Ghee. He lives outside the Maze in the Diving Bird Tavern and never lacks for cash. Over the years he has become a skilled assassin.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage,' VU

MINOR CHARACTERS

Ahloo shik Mhanukhee — a rich merchant of Sanctuary.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage,' VU

Ambutta — a young girl who carries messages for MYRTIS.

—Christine DeWees, 'Myrtis,' TW

Antelope — young son of the S'Danzo seer MOONFLOWER.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadows Pawn,' VU

Athavul — a young thief who always dresses in black. He is cocky and about as subtle as hives.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadows Pawn,' VU

Bercy — a young girl bespelled by RABBEN HALF-HAND to find out LYTHANDE'S secret of power.

—Marion Zimmer Bradley, 'The Secret of the Blue Star,' TW

Blind Jacob — a fruit seller in the Bazaar. Although he is evidently completely blind, his fruits are of the best, even occasionally including the famed Enlibar oranges. This is due to his multitude of contacts with the merchants in Sanctuary who take care to see he is happy. Jacob's very successful sideline is blackmail, for which he maintains a virtual army of urchins who spy for him.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Butterfly — a housemate of JAMIE THE RED.

—Poul Anderson, 'Gate of Flying Knives,' TW

Corellia — the Heart of Sabellia, one of the few female inquisitors for the canonical courts of Molin Torchholder.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Getting Busted in in Sanctuary,' Book 2

Coricidius — the Prince's Vizier, carries the jade copy of the seal of the governor. He is the overseer of the town's trade, and is assiduous in combing the town for violators of the tariff laws. He hates his end-of-the-road position and takes it out on the town. He can be distinguished by the perpetual sneer on his lips.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Palm Greasing,' Book 2

Corlas — the camel dealer maintains an office in his home, set against the wall of the Bazaar that borders the Governor's Palace. His tendency to keep ailing or very young camels in his back rooms is not particularly appreciated by his neighbors. Happily for him, Corlas lacks a sense of smell, which may account in part for his true love of his camels. He keeps most of his stock in the animal pens along the White Foal River; his camels are quality stock and command a good price. One of his major customers is Caravan Master SAMLOR HIL SAMT (see Major Characters).

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Cusharlain — the customs inspector and friend of Shive the Changer and in the pay of the League of Changers (fences). He is a good source of information about the goings-on in the lower-class areas of the city.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Cylene — a prostitute at the Aprodisia House, and one of MYRTIS' most trusted girls.

—Christine DeWees, 'Myrtis,' TW

Dyon — a young novitiate priest of IIS. Crippled from birth, he was left with the temple by his poor parents and raised by the church. He is extremely devout and unworldly. He delights in running errands for the Temple hierarchy and is slowly being introduced to the Temple secrets.

—Lynn Abbey, unpublished source

Enoir — servantmaster for LASTEL.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Evroen — alcoholic husband of MASHA.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage,' VU

Gage — tongueless eunuch belonging to AMOLI.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Gelicia — the madame of the House of Mermaids, a prosperous and exotic house on the Street of Red Lanterns. She is a supporter of MYRTIS, the leader of the madames on the street, and is always on the lookout for new and unusual talents.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Genfred — the only honest goldsmith in town.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Gordonesh — Archpriest of IIS in Sanctuary. This worthy patriarch is old and almost senile. He is rarely seen on the streets, working entirely through his High-Flamen, Hazroah. After the events of 'The Gate of Flying Knives,' he relied on Nikon, a Flamen who dabbles in sorcery and rabble-rousing.

—Lynn Abbey, unpublished source

Haakon — a sweets vendor in the Bazaar, popular with the vendors as well as buyers.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Hadoo — three year old daughter of MASHA ZIL-INEEL.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage', VU

Hazroah — High-Flamen of the temple of IIS.

—Poul Anderson, 'Gate of Flying Knives', TW

Honald the Gatekeeper — this man and his family control entry into the Governor's Palace. He is the man to bribe if you need access to the grounds, and again to bribe if you'd rather no one else knew about it. He is Iisig, and doesn't much care who goes in or out, as long as he is paid.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Palm Greasing:', Book 2

Jutu Stulwig — a herbal healer murdered mysteriously four years before. Believed to have been killed by VASHANKA, Father of ALTEN STULWIG.

—A.E. Van Vogt, 'The Dream of the Sorceress,' VU

Kalem — a huge eunuch employed as bodyguard and bouncer at the Lily Garden.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Kheem — five year old daughter of MASHA.

Kilite — The Rankan Emperor's chief adviser.

—Robert Asprin, 'Introduction,' TW

Kodrix — the Cirdonian noble family of which SAMLOR HIL-SAMT and SAM-LANE are members.

—David Drake, 'Goddess,' VU

Lady Rosanda — Molin Torchholder's scatter-brained wife, and is not above accepting flirtations from goodlooking men. She is blonde and zoftig, the perfect Rankan ornamental consort.

—Poul Anderson, 'Gate of Flying Knives,' TW

Light of Pearl — a housemate of JAMIE THE RED.

—Poul Anderson, 'Gate of Flying Knives,' TW

Lirain — one of the seven concubines of PRINCE KADAKITHIS. Discovered as a plotter against the Prince through information supplied by SHADOWSPAWN.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Looza — a neighbor of MASHA'S.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage', VU

Lu-Broca — the Major-Domo, the man to see to arrange legitimate interviews, or to be smuggled into the Palace itself. He, too, is Iisig, and has been in Sanctuary since before the Rankans arrived. He has keys for locks the Rankans never heard of.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Palm-Greasing:', Book 2

Lycansha — a CADITE prostitute in the HOUSE OF MERMAIDS.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Malm — one of WALEGRIIN'S lieutenants.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Markmor — a magician considered by MIZRAITH to be the second most powerful sorcerer in Sanctuary.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Marype — youngest and most ambitious son of the sorcerer MIZRAITH. Secret conspirator with MARKMOR.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Medes — The Fist of Vashanka, an inquisitor for the canonical court of MOLIN TORCHHOLDER.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Getting Busted in Sanctuary,' Book 2

Mernorad, Doctor — a doctor who attended the pregnancy of SAMLANE, wife of REGLI.

—David Drake, 'Goddess,' VU

Mignureal — thirteen year old daughter of S'Danzo seer MOONFLOWER; diminutive for it is Migne.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadows Pawn,' VU

Mikkun — a successful meat merchant with a wide clientele.

—Christine DeWees, 'Myrtis,' TW

Moonflower — the only full S'Danzo who still befriends ILLYRA. She is a competent fortuneteller, though not as accurate as Illyra, and cannot predict the near future. She supports her husband and several children with her fortunetelling; unlike Illyra, Moonflower has the full bulk of a proper S'Danzo crone. SHADOWSPAWN often consults her.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Face of Chaos,' TW

Mor-Am and Moria — a brother-sister team of sell-swords employed by JUBAL.

—Robert Asprin, 'The Price of Doing Business,' TW; 'To Guard the Guardians,' VU

Mungo — a street urchin. A leader of vendettas and gang wars.

—Robert Asprin, 'The Price of Doing Business,' TW

Nadeesha, Doctor — a doctor specializing in diseases of the rich. Often employs MASHA as a midwife.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage,' VU

Nemis — a herbal healer sometimes recommended by ALTEN STULWIG.

—A.E. Van Vogt, 'The Dream of the Sorceress,' VU

Nestaph — one of the three sons of the sorcerer MIZRAITH.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Raben the Half-Handed — a magician and BLUE STAR adept who is so named because he is missing 2½ fingers from a duel with LYTHANDE.

—Marrion Zimmer Bradley, 'The Secret of the Blue Star,' TW

Ran-tu — leader of the street urchins and a pickpocket himself. He frequents the Bazaar and can also be found in Westside or the Maze. He frequently offers to guide visitors for a price.

—Robert Asprin, 'Introduction,' TW

Rashan — The Eye of Savankala, an inquisitor for the temple of Savankala under MOLIN TORCHHOLDER.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Getting Busted in Sanctuary,' Book 2

Regli — Rankan aristocrat, current Master of the Scrolls in Sanctuary, husband of SAMLANE. Young, foppish, self-important, and totally lacking in the courage and fortitude which made the Rankan Empire paramount on the continent.

—David Drake, 'Goddess,' VU

Rost-Revenant — the Governor's Adjudicator, carries the amber seal of the Governor and hears most of the civil court cases brought before the Prince. He also attends all capital punishments to be sure they are carried out correctly. He is known as incorruptible and very busy. His scribes, clerks, provosts, etc. do not share the reputation, though he tries to keep an eye on them.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Getting Busted in Sanctuary,' Book 2

Runo — one of WALEGRIIN'S lieutenants, murdered in the Maze.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Saliman — Chief lieutenant to JUBAL and master of his espionage force.

—Robert Asprin, 'The Price of Doing Business,' TW

Samlane — Cirdonian noblewoman, sister of SAMLOR HIL-SAMT and wife of REGLI.

—David Drake, 'Goddess,' VU

Shive the Changer — one of the better-known moneylenders, pawnbrokers and fences in the Bazaar. He is one of the members of the League of Changers and is on good terms with CUSHARLAIN, the customs inspector.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Shkedeure sha-Mizl — a rich farmer living several hours journey outside the city.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spiders of the Purple Mage,' VU

Shmurt — caretaker of the tenement that MASHA lives in. Very protective and concerned about strangers entering the building.

—Philip Jose Farmer, 'Spider of the Purple Mage,' VU

Stefab — One of the three sons of the sorcerer MIZRAITH.

—Joe Haldeman, 'Blood Brothers,' TW

Stilcho — Master of the Equerry, goes beyond his nominal duties as stable master to run a thorough spy network throughout the Palace grounds. If you want to know what's happening, or to cause something to happen, nudge Stilcho.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Palm-Greasing:', Book 2

Taya — one of PRINCE KADAKITHIS' concubines. She is young, beautiful and bored and although always accompanied by at least one guard, is not above picking up a goodlooking man for an evening.

—Andrew J. Offutt, 'Shadowspawn,' TW

Terryle — the Tax Collector, the man who collects all the non-tariff taxes. He is the possessor of the unicorn-horn seal, and is perhaps the most detested man in Sanctuary.

—Lynn Abbey, 'Palm-Greasing:', Book 2

Thrusher — One of WALEGRIIN'S lieutenants.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Two Thumb — a bartender who replaced ONE-THUMB in the Vulgar Unicorn when he disappeared. He is also known as BUBOE.

—Lynn Abbey, 'The Fruit of Enlibar,' VU

Wallu — fifty year old mother of MASHA.

INTRODUCTION TO THE STATISTICS

The game system statistics are given alphabetically by game system. All the ADVANCED DUNGEONS&DRAGONS® statistics are before the Adventures in Fantasy statistics which are before the Chivalry & Sorcery® statistics, and so on. Within each game system section there are short essays explaining how to adapt Thieves' World to that particular system, followed by character descriptions. Each set of character descriptions is arranged in three sections: Prince, Retinue, and Officials, followed by Residents of the city, in turn followed by Transients in the city.

Most of the systems also describe some of the more prominent monsters and gods of Sanctuary, for those of your players who want to brave the Sikkintairs with Jamie the Red, to steal away the treasures of the Purple Mage, or to dare the bed of Azyuna.

Not all the included systems depict the same characters or the same number of characters in their statistics. What was or what was not useful for the game was a decision left to the authors; we did not dictate a particular list of characters. For this reason, as well as for the intrinsic interest of the many prefacing and appended notes, we strongly suggest that game-masters thumb through all of this book. This material was prepared by some of the keenest minds in role-playing—GMs will discover useful ideas on almost every page.

In the Appendices is a list of the stories from THIEVES' WORLD and TALES FROM THE VULGAR UNICORN, giving the author and noting what characters first appeared in what story. Many characters, of course, also appeared in subsequent stories, but this list will help any gamemaster intent on his or her own research into the byways of Sanctuary.

ADVANCED D&D™

Lawrence Schick

In general, the world of Sanctuary is very similar to most AD&D™ worlds. The character classes are evident everywhere: fighters abound, in the service of prince and crime lord; thieves lurk in every shadow; awesome magic-users manipulate tremendous forces; clerics enjoy direct connections with their gods, and receive aid and instructions therefrom. It is well-known that magic weapons and armor exist, and that magic amulets can protect you from evil influences. There are portals to other planes. The very city is undermined by a honeycomb of dungeon passages.

The only real rules problem area is in grafting the AD&D™ magic system onto Thieves' World. This is made harder by the fact that there is no consistent magic system in the stories themselves. Enas Yorl's magic of object activity does not mesh with Miraith's magic of sustained charms, which does not mesh with Lythande's magic of drawing upon the collective knowledge and power of the Blue Star Order, which does not mesh with the Purple Mage's magic of mechanical similarity. (Not to mention the S'Danzo seer or clerical magic.)

There are two ways for a referee using the AD&D™ system to handle this dilemma: the DM can try to invent a variant system to handle each of these various magics, or the DM can simply lay the framework of AD&D™ spellcasting over the abilities of the various characters, and adjust where absolutely necessary. For the sake of ease and uniformity, the statistics herein were prepared using the latter method. This is not to discourage anyone with the time and inclination from actually working out the different magic systems. However, new systems cannot be recommended for use by player characters until they have been extensively playtested with NPCs.

Tempus regenerates damage (at a rate of 1 hit point per round), and he ages very slowly, if at all. Furthermore, Vashanka may actually help Tempus indirectly if the Hell Hound is caught in a tight spot, and if it serves the god's purposes.

Tempus is over 350 years old, and among other things he has been a general, a philosopher, and a magic-user. (He still retains the knowledge of a few simple spells, such as a selective version of the illusionists' spell Change Self.)

Though Stulwig has no adventurer's abilities to speak of (aside from an untrained talent in staff-fighting), he has a vast knowledge of herbs and drugs, combining the botanical knowledge of a sage with the potion-making skills of an alchemist. There is a 50% chance that he can make any sort of health-altering concoction desired (beneficial or baneful). The cost may be high, and Stulwig often requires payment in services rather than money. He cannot create magical potions without the help of a spell-caster.

Enas Yorl has several familiars, including a black cat, a crow, and probably a pseudo-dragon. As an 18th level wizard, Enas Yorl has access to many spells, and typically carries at least the following spells:

Magic Missile (x3)	Invisibility
Stinking Cloud	Dispel Magic
Hold Person	Fear
Teleport	Cone of Cold
Globe of Invulnerability	Gears
Limited Wish	Polymorph any object
Mass Charm	Power Word
Kill

Enas Yorl lives in a large subterranean palace, protected by tame basilisks, Guards and Wards, traps, and liberal use of Distance Distortion. There is a tunnel connecting his underground lair with a tower overlooking the bay.

(The DM should assume that Enas Yorl is equipped with magic items of a number and kind appropriate to a very high level magic-user. In particular, he should have many protective devices and charms. Choose whatever is most suitable, remembering that these items may fall into the hands of player characters).

Kemren uses no material components when casting his spells. He derives the magical energy normally supplied by material components from a series of mechanical-magical devices. These run constantly, providing the mage with power for his spells. If any of them are damaged, the Purple Mage will temporarily lose several levels of magic-user ability, and he may suffer direct damage, depending on the device and how it was damaged (DM's discretion). Needless to say, these devices are well-guarded.

The following are some of the spells typically used by the Purple Mage:

Charm Person	Magic Missile
Protection from Evil	Invisibility
Knock	Dispel Magic
Lightning Bolt	Phantasmal Force
Charm Monster	Fear
Minor Globe of Invulner- ability	Wall of Fire

One-Thumb is well-known to be protected by a curse which will fall upon whoever slays him. It is said that the killer will burn in eternal magic flame. Remove Curse will negate it, but perhaps not before permanent psychic damage is done.) Mizraith maintains this charm, and One-Thumb/Lastel pays him handsomely to do so.

Cappen Varra wears a silver amulet shaped like a coiled snake. This is a potent charm vs. magic. It will protect him against all spells and supernatural creatures of less than divine stature. (This set of creatures primarily includes entities from other planets, and beings such as undead, who are powered by or connected to other planes.) To make the amulet function, the minstrel must speak three truths about the spellcaster or creature.

Blue Star magic is non-standard, mixing the disciplines of sorcery and illusion, and drawing on a different power source for spells. Lythande need not memorize spells before use, as Blue Star Mages all draw upon the collective knowledge of their Order. However, Lythande's power is equivalent to the levels given above. The mage can employ almost any spell of the 6th level or below, but will typically use magic duplicating the effects of the following spells:

Burning Hands	Detect Magic
Hold Person	Animate Object (as the clerical spell)
Charm Person (or Monster)	Contact Other Plane
Lightning Bolt	Geas
Cone of Cold	Paralysis (as the wand)
Phantasmal Forces	Whirlwind (similar to a djinni's)
Shadow Monsters

Lythande's long life (several generations) and non-standard magic use has enabled the spellcaster to learn to fight fairly well, usually with a rapier or long sword. Lythande can also Move Silently and Hide in Shadows like a 10th level thief (88% and 73% respectively).

Among Ils' powers are the abilities to Shape Change at will, and to cause a Great Wind that can come roaring out of the sky to sweep its victims off into the beyond (unless they save vs. spells at -4). He can also summon 2-8 sikkintairs once per day.

Ils' clerics are all male, and all wear tonsures and robes. Lower level clerics wear black robes. The second highest priest always wears a scarlet robe and is known as the High Flamen.

These vicious predators from the plane of Concordant Opposition are only found on the Prime Material Plane on the business of the god I1s or his servants. They are great scaly bat-winged serpents, each with a pair of powerful legs ending in sword-like talons, and a mouth full of sharp teeth. The numbers in parentheses above give the incidence and treasure of sikkintairs when on their home plane.

Similar to ants in their habits, these creatures are generally found in or near water where they feed on various marine life. They will also, like certain South American fish, feed on human flesh. On land they will not attack unless cornered (like in their nests) but in water they are dangerous. If the victim is swimming in less than 6' of water the crabs will be able to attack but in deeper water they cannot reach a swimming target. Boats will also offer protection unless the crabs can leap into them from above (so long as the boat is in water). When moving away from the nest they will be preceded by 1-6 scouts followed by the main body of 6-60. A nest will contain 1-10 nurses guarding the 6-60 eggs but there will be no other treasure but that left by earlier adventurers that were killed. Generally set to guard the water entrances to the temples and shrines of Weda Krihtawn. The flesh is poisonous to all but the ghoondah fish.

MAGICAL ENCOUNTERS for THIEVES' WORLD

Commentary

It is assumed from all available descriptions of the activities within the city of Sanctuary that magicians operate alone or with only one or two assistants. There are references to various Guilds and organizations but none of them appear to have training centers in the city. This is not overly surprising considering the chaotic conditions that exist there which would be quite distracting to a disciplined study of magic.

Judging by the arrangements made by "The Purple Mage" an outdoor encounter would involve a mixture of human guards, tricks, traps and special animals covering a maze-like structure—all to frustrate the would-be thief or assassin.

Within the city the presence of a number of Temples does indicate that there are training structures for the priesthood(s). These involve rather elaborate temples with mazes, tricks, traps and special encounters as typified by the Temple of Iis and Dyareela/Heqt. At this point a specific locale has to be set by the Dungeon Master to accommodate that sort of situation accurately.

So with that in mind the following table is provided for the more common sort of encounter with a mage as might happen in the lanes and byways of Sanctuary!

ARTIFACTS, TRICKS, TRAPS, and GIZMOS

Below is a partial list of such items and how I would handle them within the context of ADVENTURES IN FANTASY. Volume references are to the first 3 volumes of AIF.

PIPES OF ILS — Allows the user to summon Sikkintairs, protects the user (and by implication those near him, say 10') and allows the user to command Sikkintairs onto a quest (such as kidnapping one or more individuals). If the user is slain the Sikkintairs will continue on their last orders. Upon completion of these orders they will, as they usually do, attack any living thing nearby with priority given to anything that is attacking the Sikkintairs.

PARCHMENT OF THE NEXT WORLD — A 4' by 8' parchment with magical runes inscribed along the edge of one side. When unfolded and hung (note that the surface cannot be pierced when hung up) allows anyone to enter one side and emerge into the "Next World" (Dimension, whatever). Cannot be folded up but must be rolled, if folded it will immediately be totally destroyed. Anything of less than 4' by 8' can use the entryway. By implication and legend there would seem to be other parchments that provide entry to other "Other Worlds", "Next Worlds" that are different from the ones where the Sikkintairs live.

STATUES OF ILS — These two statues are representations of the god ILS and are made out of solid gold. They would thus qualify as (see Vol. II, pp35) 5,000GP artifacts with saving throws, etc. as described in the paragraph marked #.

THUNDERSTONE OF ILS — Is capable of hurling bolts of lightning three times per day. Anything hit by such a bolt must make a saving throw against six point magic or die. Worth 200GP as a decorative amulet.

DIAMOND RODS OF CIME — Although evidently not rendered entirely powerless by their loss these rods would seem to enhance her regular powers and also offer some protection against magic. Treat them as being a Hair Amulet (Vol. II, pp41) and as a Diamond Talisman (Vol. II, pp43). Must be used together to gain the above advantages. Worth at least 500GP each (1,000GP total).

TEMPUS' SWORD — Evidence indicates that this weapon can negate any magical protection (like armor) and gives a 15% combat bonus to hitting. It has no Ego or Intelligence and is of Chaotic alignment (Vol. II, pp39). Worth 50-100GP total.

PROTECTIVE AMULET — Glows green, treat as Topaz Amulet (Vol. II, pp42). Needless to say this has no effect on Tempus' sword.

SINGING SWORD — Treat as an Amulet of Bells (Vol. II, pp40).

SERPENT BRACELET — When touched by anyone but the wearer it turns into a small but deadly serpent whose bite will almost instantly ossify (turn to rock) every bone in the body. Roll for saving throw against 6 point magic. Failure means death. Worth 10-100GP as decoration.

CANE OF TERROR — It's touch (except when properly held by the handle) will reduce the victim to gibbering in abject terror. Treat as a sword for attacks (i.e. weapon length) and give a 50% increase in the chance for a surprise attack when used in conjunction with a blind man disguise. Consider it as the 3 point insanity spell (Vol. II) 5 point Fear spell will last 1-3 days (not turns) and after running the 1-10 turns the victim will collapse into a gibbering heap. Has no intrinsic value.

SAVANKALA ROD OF AUTHORITY — Increases the bearers' Social Rank 5 points if they already are of noble rank. Increases your reputation 5 points no matter what your rank. It is worth 250GP normally as an artifact.

SMHEE'S (Rhandhee Ghee's) ANTI-SPIDER OINTMENT — Treat this as being capable of repelling all 'normal' insect attacks. Magically induced attacks would seem to still be possible or at least those by specially bred insects.

FIRE STICKS — Description seems to be that of regular wooden matches or white flares. If kept dry these will allow you to start fires immediately whether torches, campfires, or a thatched roof.

BLOWGUNS — Treat as short bow with 1/5 normal range. Can be easily concealed but takes one melee round to assemble for use. Once assembled and loaded for use can be concealed in one's robes. If dart is poisoned treat as saving throw vs. 8 point magic.

POISONED THORNS — Treat as saving throw vs. 3 point magic for each melee round you are entangled with the thorn bush.

CHIVALRY & SORCERY®

Wes Ives

I have taken some liberties with the facts as presented in Thieves' World, especially in the realm of Magic. All types of magic work in Sanctuary, as do prayers to a variety of Gods. However, it is quite beyond the scope of this offering to provide a tailored magic system for each mage in Sanctuary and do it the justice that a replacement for C&S' complex system demands. Therefore, I have smoothed the edges and ignored the eccentricities in an attempt to make the mages of Sanctuary comply with C&S magic. It is not the best of worlds, but it is the only one possible. I strongly suspect that one of the very last things an author considers when he or she is hot on the trail of a denouement is "how is this proposed magical effect going to fit into an over-all system of magic in a role-playing setting?" It is not their job, after all, to explain their magicians' systems; rather, their part is to use those systems wisely.

Another liberty is in weapon use. Since there is no "chivalry" per se in Sanctuary, but there are a large number of very good fighters with excellent training, either in the Imperial Guard or Hard Knock U., I have considered nearly everyone to be a chivalric fighter, unless they were manifestly not fighters at all. This decision is evident mainly in the fact that all characters have a weapon or weapons in which they specialize, and for which they receive fighter bonuses.

Finally, a few characters simply shouldn't be here at all; major among them are the Purple Mage (who never did anything except appear in one scene, dead, though he is included if you want to replay the Spiders scenario) and Molin Torchholder (who was just too ephemeral for me to get a line on).

Appearance: 12 Charisma: 13 Alignment: 12
Personal Combat Factor: 22
Body Points: 28
Fatigue Points: 21

As a Guardsman, Aye-Gophlan is versed in the use of the Broadsword, Dagger, Short Sword, and Spear, and is +12% to hit and to parry with all four weapons. On duty he wears AC 4; off-duty he wears AC 1. Aye-Gophlan is not a wealthy man, and lives from payday to payday on his Guardsman's salary of 10 SP per day.

BOURNE

Sex: male Occupation: Hell Hound
Birthplace: unknown Class: fighter
Level: 5 Height: 6'1"
Weight: 200 lbs.
Constitution: 13 Strength: 16 Dexterity: 10
Bardic Voice: 9 Intelligence: 11 Wisdom: 11
Appearance: 14 Charisma: 11 Alignment: 14
Personal Combat Factor: 13
Body Points: 21
Fatigue Points: 12

As a Hell Hound, Bourne is proficient with the Short Sword, Dagger, and Spear, and is +10 to hit and parry with each. He wears AC 5 when on duty.

His pay is 9 SP per day, plus an honorarium of 5 SP per day to report back to the Emperor with any interesting observations about the Prince.

DANLIS

Sex: female	Occupation: ancilla
Level: 4	Class: non-fighter
Height: 5'2"	Weight: 95 lbs.
Constitution: 13	Strength: 9	Dexterity: 14
Bardic Voice: 15	Intelligence: 14	Wisdom: 16
Appearance: 18	Charisma: 18	Alignment: 7
Personal Combat Factor: 5

PRINCE KADAKITHIS

Sex: male	Occupation: Imperial Governor, Sanctuary
Birthplace: Ranke	Relatives: half-brother to the Emperor
Level: 3	Class: non-fighter
Height: 5'5"	Weight: 120 lbs.
Constitution: 13	Strength: 9	Dexterity: 14
Bardic Voice: 15	Intelligence: 15	Wisdom: 16
Appearance: 13	Charisma: 15	Alignment: 7
Personal Combat Factor: 10
Body Points: 11
Fatigue Points: 11

As Imperial Governor, Kadakithis seldom needs to rely upon his own abilities as a swordsman. If he must fight, though, he is trained in the use of the Broadsword and Dagger, and +6% to hit and -6% to parry with both. The Prince is very wealthy.

QUAG

Sex: male	Occupation: Hell Hound
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 8	Class: fighter
Height: 5'8"	Weight: 150 lbs.
Constitution: 12	Strength: 12	Dexterity: 10
Bardic Voice: 9	Intelligence: 8	Wisdom: 9
Appearance: 10	Charisma: 10	Alignment: 9
Personal Combat Factor: 15.5
Body Points: 21
Fatigue Points: 18

Quag is proficient with the following weapons: Sword, Short Sword, Spear, Light Crossbow. He is +12% to hit, and -12% to parry, with all of them. His pay is 9 SP per day.

RAZKULI

Sex: male	Occupation: Hell Hound
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 2	Class: fighter
Height: 5'5"	Weight: 120 lbs.
Constitution: 15	Strength: 12 Dexterity: 14
Bardic Voice: 10	Intelligence: 12 Wisdom: 8
Appearance: 10	Charisma: 11 Alignment: 8
Personal Combat Factor: 7.5
Body Points: 11
Fatigue Points: 7

Razkuli is a young fellow, without as much training as the other Hell Hounds. He is +4% to hit and -4% to parry with the Sword and the Light Crossbow.

As a new Hell Hound, he earns 7 SP per day.

TEMPUS

Sex: male	Occupation: Hell Hound
Birthplace: Azehur	Relatives: younger brother, Lord of Azehur
Level: 22	Class: fighter
Height: 6'0"	Weight: 180 lbs.
Constitution: 15	Strength: 15 Dexterity: 13
Bardic Voice: 14	Intelligence: 13 Wisdom: 15
Appearance: 13	Charisma: 13 Alignment: 17
Personal Combat Factor: 48
Body Points: 32
Fatigue Points: 40

Tempus is a favorite of Vashanka, who has given Tempus several tokens of appreciation:

- (1) Long Life—at least 3 centuries.
- (2) Regeneration—Injuries heal at the rate of 2D6 points of damage per turn.
- (3) Disguise—he can assume the appearance of another person. Treat this as an Illusion cast by a MU of proficiency grade VI, for purposes determining the illusion's success or failure.
- (4) Enchanted Weapon—his weapon is a +8 Broadsword. There is an 80% chance that any missile directed at Tempus will be reflected back against the firer, and the sword functions as a Protective Device with 200 Experience Factors when Tempus is the target of Magick. The sword must be drawn to perform its warding functions.

WALEGRIN

Sex: male	Occupation: Mercenary Captain
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: Illyra
Level: 7	Class: fighter
Height: 6' 2"	Weight: 210 lbs.
Constitution: 14	Strength: 16 Dexterity: 14
Bardic Voice: 11	Intelligence: 13 Wisdom: 12
Appearance: 12	Charisma: 12 Alignment: 10
Personal Combat Factor: 15.5
Body Points: 23
Fatigue Points: 14

Walegrin is +12% to hit and -12% to parry with the Broadsword and the Dagger. He wears AC 3 when on duty, and AC 1 otherwise. While a soldier, he received 10 SP per day of active duty; since he has deserted, he receives no soldier's pay.

ZALBAR

Sex: male	Occupation: Captain of the Hell Hounds
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 14	Class: fighter
Height: 5'11"	Weight: 170 lbs.
Constitution: 12	Strength: 15 Dexterity: 12
Bardic Voice: 9	Intelligence: 11 Wisdom: 13
Appearance: 12	Charisma: 11 Alignment: 6
Personal Combat Factor: 32
Body Points: 26
Fatigue Points: 28

A member of the Prince's personal guard, Zalbar is a well-trained military man, proficient with the Short Sword, Broadsword, Spear, and Light Crossbow. He is +12% to hit and -12% for parries with all of the above.

RESIDENTSALTEN STULWIG

Sex: male	Occupation: healer
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: none (Parents dead)
Level: 7	Class: physician
Height: 5'6"	Weight: 130 lbs.
Constitution: 14	Strength: 10 Dexterity: 14
Bardic Voice: 7	Intelligence: 14 Wisdom: 13
Appearance: 4	Charisma: 2 Alignment: 14
Personal Combat Factor: 10
Body Points: 16
Fatigue Points: 15

Alten Stulwig carries a staff which he can wield with some proficiency, as it has been blessed by IIs. Treat it as a LH Quarterstaff. Alten is +6% to hit, and +12% to parry, with this weapon. For his abilities as a doctor, see the Sourcebook. He earns 18 SP per day, plus the fringe benefit of knowing who has bought poisons, abortifacients, and such.

AMOLI

Sex: female	Occupation: madame of the Lily Garden
Level: 7	Class: non-fighter
Height: 5'0"	Weight: 100 lbs.
Constitution: 14	Strength: 8 Dexterity: 11
Bardic Voice: 11	Intelligence: 10 Wisdom: 12
Appearance: 16	Charisma: 14 Alignment: 13
Personal Combat Factor: 11
Body Points: 12
Fatigue Points: 14

Amoli would use a Dagger if she had to. However, she is usually guarded by a eunuch who is a level 10 Average Fighter, and who uses a Scimitar. The Lily Garden is a main competitor of the Aphrodisia House. It has receipts of 10 GP per night.

ENAS YORL

Sex: ?	Occupation: mage
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 22	Class: Power Word mage
Height: ?	Weight: ?
Constitution: ?	Strength: ? Dexterity: ?
Bardic Voice: ?	Intelligence: 18 Wisdom: 16
Appearance: ?	Charisma: ? Alignment: 10
Personal Combat Factor: depends on his shape, but always low: he never gets enough practice in any single shape.
Body Points: vary
Fatigue Points: vary

Due to a curse, Enas Yorl is an unwilling shapeshifter. Every turn roll D100: if this roll is less than 4, then Enas Yorl has changed shape. Roll again: if this roll is between 6 and 30, his sex is female. If it is less than 5, he changes into some non-human species, otherwise he becomes a human male of random characteristics. The GM should go with the flow on this curse, and afflict Enas Yorl with whatever strikes the GM's fancy.

Enas Yorl is a powerful mage with the following abilities:

Concentration Level: 310

PMF: 33

Magick Level: 15

Spells Known:

Detection: Enemies, Invisible Presence, Observation, See the Invisible
Communication/Transport: Teleportal, Levitate

Basic Magick: all Air, all Water

Commands: Charm, Sleep, Clumsiness, Confusion, Demoralization, Forgetfulness

Illusions: Blurred Image, Illusory Script, Phantasmal Landscape, Phantom Monsters, Phantom Forces, Detect (VI), Dispel (VI)

Ancient Lore: Night Vision, Ventriloquism, Astral Lock, Knock, Haste, Legend Lore

Demonology: through BMR 8

HANSE SHADOWSPAWN

Sex: male	Occupation: thief
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 4	Class: thief

Height: 5'4"	Weight: 115 lbs.
Constitution: 16	Strength: 14
Bardic Voice: 9	Intelligence: 13
Appearance: 12	Charisma: 14
Personal Combat Factor: 11	Dexterity: 18
Body Points: 13	Wisdom: 12
Fatigue Points: 8	Alignment: 15
Hanse's preferred weapons are the Light Sword and the Dagger: he is +8% to hit and -8% to parry with both. Hanse keeps about a half-dozen knives concealed about his person. He does not wear armor.
Due to his abortive attempt to avenge Cudget, his mentor, Hanse is fairly wealthy, with 350 SP in his possession.

KEMREN, THE PURPLE MAGE

Sex: male	Occupation: mechanician
Level 17	Class: mage
Height: 5'9"	Weight: 145 lbs.
Constitution: 10	Strength: 9
Bardic Voice: 10	Intelligence: 20
Appearance: 6	Charisma: 7
Kemren is a former devotee of Weda Krishtawn, and retains the custom of rubbing himself with rancid butter. He stinks to high heaven.	Dexterity: 13
Personal Combat Factor: 24	Wisdom: 14
Body Points: 28	Alignment: 19
Fatigue Points: 30
Kemren's weapon of choice is the Dagger, with which he is +11% to hit and -11% with his parries.

Kemren is a Mechanician Artificer with the following abilities:
 Concentration Level: 160
 Magick Level: 12

Kemren knows many spells which he has placed into a variety of devices scattered throughout his lair:
 Black Magick: Slow, Weakness
 Ancient Lore: Noise, Hear, Knock, Silence, Healing, Haste
 Illusion: Wall of Fog, Detect (V), Spectral Monsters (spiders)
 Detection: all
 Basic Magick: all Water, all Earth.

Kemren's home is well-guarded, both by living and unliving creatures. He has animated statues and other devices at his beck and call which would require 1000 days to construct by the C&S rules for animated servants.

KURD

Sex: male	Occupation: healer
Birthplace: Ranke	Relatives: unknown
Level: 9	Class: Physician
Height: 5'8"	Weight: 120 lbs.
Constitution: 7	Strength: 8
Bardic Voice: 10	Intelligence: 19
Appearance: 4	Charisma: 10
Personal Combat Factor: 5.5	Dexterity: 15
Body Points: 6	Wisdom: 14
Fatigue Points: 5	Alignment: 17

As a physician, Kurd has all of the medical skills listed in the Sourcebook. However, he gets lesss custom than does Alten Stulwig, even though Kurd's knowledge is greater. This is just as well, since it leaves Kurd with more time to pursue his studies. His daily income is 10 SP.

MASHA zil-INEEL

Sex: female	Occupation: midwife, barber, dentist
Birthplace: Sanctuary	Relatives: none (Parents: merchant)
Level: 6	Class: thief
Height: 5'4"	Weight: 100 lbs.
Constitution: 15	Strength: 10
Bardic Voice: 9	Intelligence: 13
Appearance: 12	Charisma: 14
Personal Combat Factor: 9	Dexterity: 18
Body Points: 14	Wisdom: 13
Fatigue Points: 12	Alignment: 6

Masha's favorite weapons are the Short Sword and the Dagger, and she is +12% to hit and -12% for parries with both. She wears no armor. A recent adventure has resulted in the acquisition of a fortune in jewelry; she now possesses fifty or so gems worth a total of 2000 GP. Her holding on to them is an open question.

MELILOT

Sex: male	Occupation: master scribe
Level: 9	Class: non-fighter
Height: 5'4"	Weight: 120 lbs.
Constitution: 10	Strength: 9
Bardic Voice: 10	Intelligence: 16
Appearance: 10	Charisma: 14
Personal Combat Factor: 14	Dexterity: 16
Body Points: 17	Wisdom: 17
Fatigue Points: 15	Alignment: 17

Melilot's favorite weapon is the pen, which really is mightier than most swords in his hands. If someone wanted to get physical, Melilot would defend himself with a Dagger, and later destroy his opponent with a few well-chosen forgeries.

MIZRAITH

Sex: male	Occupation: mage
Level: 22	Class: illusionist
Height: 5'6"	Weight: 125 lbs.
Constitution: 11	Strength: 9
Bardic Voice: 9	Intelligence: 18
Appearance: 8	Charisma: 13
Personal Combat Factor: 16	Dexterity: 15
Body Points: 19	Wisdom: 15
Fatigue Points: 21	Alignment: 14

Mizraith's weaponry and armor is his magic. His magical abilities are as follows:

Concentration Level 310

PMF: 32

Magick Level: 15

In C&S terms, Mizraith is a Thaumaturge. He knows the following spells:

Demonology: through BMR 7

Black Magick: Slow, Weakness, Curse, Antidote, Possession

Ancient Lore: Ventriloquism, Astral Lock, Silence, Farsight, Legend Lore, Doppelganger, Gaseous Form, Interdimensional Labyrinth, Super Concentration, Vitality

Illusion: All through Ninth Circle inclusively

Commands: Charm Person, Mesmerism, Geas, Forgetfulness, Summon (allows Mizraith to force any of his students to appear before him)

Detection: Magick, Enemies, Poison, Observation, See Invisible

Basic Magic: all Fire, all Air

MYRTIS

Sex: female	Occupation: madame of Aphrodisia House
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 10	Class: non-fighter
Height: 5'4"	Weight: 105 lbs.
Constitution: 15	Strength: 9
Bardic Voice: 14	Intelligence: 13
Appearance: 19	Charisma: 18
Personal Combat Factor: 14	Dexterity: 13
Body Points: 20	Wisdom: 15
Fatigue Points: 18	Alignment: 8

Myrtis doesn't fight. If she had to, she would use a Dagger, but for what does one hire guards, hmmm?

Aphrodisia House is a very successful establishment, and is an economic bulwark of Sanctuary. Average nightly receipts are 25 GP.

ONE-THUMB (LASTEL)

Sex: male	Occupation: prop. of the Vulgar Unicorn
Level: 8	Class: non-fighter
Height: 5'8"	Weight: 155 lbs.
Constitution: 12	Strength: 11
Bardic Voice: 10	Intelligence: 13
Appearance: 7	Charisma: 10
Personal Combat Factor: 13	Dexterity: 14
Body Points: 18	Wisdom: 13
Fatigue Points: 14	Alignment: 20

One-Thumb seldom needs to fight. When he must, he uses either a Dagger or Light Sword, and is +8% to hit and parry with each weapon. He does not wear armor.

One-Thumb's income from the Vulgar Unicorn, plus his other, far less respectable activities, bring him an income of 50 SP daily.

□□□□□ TRANSIENTS □□□□□

CAPPEN VARRA

Sex: male	Occupation: bard
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 5	Class: thief
Height: 5'6"	Weight: 125 lbs.
Constitution: 13	Strength: 12	Dexterity: 17
Bardic Voice: 19	Intelligence: 14	Wisdom: 15
Appearance: 16	Charisma: 21	Alignment: 7
Personal Combat Factor: 11.8
Body Points: 15
Fatigue Points: 11

Cappen Varra's preferred weapon is the Light Sword, with which he is +10% to hit and -10% with his parries. He wears AC 1.

JAMIE THE RED

Sex: male	Occupation: hired sword
Birthplace: northlands	Relatives: unknown; parents royalty?
Level: 6	Class: fighter
Height: 6'2"	Weight: 210 lbs.
Constitution: 16	Strength: 18	Dexterity: 12
Bardic Voice: 9	Intelligence: 11	Wisdom: 11
Appearance: 13	Charisma: 11	Alignment: 10
Personal Combat Factor: 15
Body Points: 26
Fatigue Points: 14

Jamie's favorite weapons are the Claymore (use LH Barbarian Longsword) and the LH Thrusting Spear: with both, he is +12% to hit and -12% to parry. He wears a Chain Hauberk (AC 7) and a helm which is the equivalent of a type 4 helm.

JARVEENA

Sex: female	Occupation: apprentice scribe
Birthplace: Holt (Yenized)	Relatives: none surviving
Level: 3	Class: thief
Height: 5'0"	Weight: 95 lbs.
Constitution: 17	Strength: 10	Dexterity: 15
Bardic Voice: 14	Intelligence: 15	Wisdom: 18
Appearance: 10	Charisma: 11	Alignment: 10
Personal Combat Factor: 4
Body Points: 12
Fatigue Points: 7

Jarveena's preferred weapon is the Throwing Dagger. Her PCF score of 4 belies her expertise with this weapon: when using a Throwing Dagger her PCF is 15. Her armor is AC 1; her dodge chance is -15%. Jarveena carries her wealth with her: one C&S gold piece, and a silver pin which can be sold for 3 GP.

LYTHANDE

Sex: (fe)male	Occupation: mercenary mage
Birthplace: unknown	Relatives: unknown
Level: 17	Class: mage of the Blue Star
Height: 6'8"	Weight: 250 lbs.
Constitution: 12	Strength: 9	Dexterity: 14
Bardic Voice: 16	Intelligence: 20	Wisdom: 18
Appearance: 8	Charisma: 16	Alignment: 8
Personal Combat Factor: 24
Body Points: 28
Fatigue Points: 30

Lythande's weapon of choice is the Light Sword, with which he is +11% to hit and -11% to his parries. He wears no armor. Lythande's magical abilities are as follows:

Concentration Level: 160

Magic Level: 12

In C&S terms, Lythande is a Sorcerer, a 'solitary hex master' who has specialized in Power Word Magic. His focus is the blue star emblazoned on his forehead. He knows the following spells:

Demonology: through BMR 7

Black Magick: Slow, Weakness, Curse, Antidote, Possession

Ancient Lore: Noise, Hear, Knock, Silence, Healing, Haste

Illusion: Wall of Fog, Delusion, Trustworthiness, Projected Image, Detect (V)
Commands: Charm, Sleep, Mesmerism, Geas
Detection: Magick, Invisible Presence, Observation
Basic Magick: all Fire, all Air

Lythande is not as wealthy as he could be. He possesses about 100 GP. However, should he hire himself out, he commands a wage of 8 GP per day, plus bonuses.

SAMLOR hil SAMT

Sex: male	Occupation: caravan master
Level: 12	Class: fighter
Height: 6'0"	Weight: 190 lbs.
Constitution: 12	Strength: 14	Dexterity: 12
Bardic Voice: 11	Intelligence: 12	Wisdom: 14
Appearance: 9	Charisma: 12	Alignment: 9
Personal Combat Factor: 26
Body Points: 33
Fatigue Points: 24

Samlor is an accomplished fighter, and is versed in the use of the Dagger, Short Sword, and Broadsword. He is +12 to hit and parry with each. When he expects to fight, Samlor wears AC 5.

Samlor hil Samt's caravans are fairly lucrative, and bring him an income of 25 SP daily. The earnings are not consistent, of course, but rather come in lump sums every month or so, when a caravan has safely reached its destination.

SMHEE

Sex: male	Occupation: avenger for Weda Krihtawn
Level: 7	Class: thief
Height: 5'0"	Weight: 180 lbs.
Constitution: 14	Strength: 9	Dexterity: 14
Bardic Voice: 11	Intelligence: 15	Wisdom: 15
Appearance: 6	Charisma: 7	Alignment: 5
Personal Combat Factor: 10
Body Points: 20
Fatigue Points: 16

Smhee is not as ugly as his appearance score seems to indicate. However, it is the practice of priests of Weda Krihtawn to smear themselves with rancid butter, which makes for foul air around them. When he fights, Smhee uses a Garrote if he can take his prey unaware, or a Dagger if he must attack frontal. With a Garrote, Smhee will inflict 10 points of damage per turn if he can snare his target—the chance that he will be able to slip the noose over the target's head is 25% (assuming he has maneuvered himself into a position behind the unsuspecting victim), and may be modified by circumstances. With the Dagger, Smhee has a 14% bonus to his normal hit chances. Smhee is also a moderately skilled physician, with knowledge of all medical arts through fourth level.

□□□□□ MONSTERS □□□□□

BENGIL CRABS

Body: 30	Weight: 100	Move: 40 (90 swim)
Armor Class: 6	Hit Bonus: +10%	Dodge: -0%
Attacks: 3 x WDF MGB 10 pincers.

Bengil crabs are social arachnids. They nest in groups of 5-30 (5D6), and have an ant-like communicative ability. The crabs are air-breathers, but their preferred environment is the water (unless cornered or defending eggs), but they are totally without fear in the water. Kemren keeps a nest of these crabs in all of the watercourses leading into his lair. If a prudent explorer times it right, the crabs can be bypassed, as they leave their nest en masse to feed at night. Note, though, that they also return en masse, so it is not wise to tarry in a Bengil crab nesting pool.

SIKKINTAIR (The Flying Knives)

Body: 65	Move 50 (650 fly)
Armor Class: 1	Hit Bonus: 15%
Attacks: 3 x WDF MGC talons; 4 x WDF MGB bite	Dodge: -10%

The Sikkintair are from another plane of existence and, thanks to Cappen Varra and Jamie the Red, they probably can't get here anymore. However, there are always those (usually mages without better sense) who think that a Sikkintair would make an excellent servitor . . .

DRAGONQUEST

Eric Goldberg

Introduction

This essay is a set of guidelines for using Thieves' World characters with the DragonQuest rules. Herein are explanations of the reasoning which went into the character ratings, and suggestions on how to reconcile the differences between Thieves' World and DragonQuest. The gamesmaster and the players are bound to tinker with the instructions and perhaps even second-guess the character values: the design decisions are given as a basis for comparison, and for those who are initially reluctant to invest a large amount of time into the preparation of this scenario.

The laws of Thieves' World and of the DragonQuest universe have experienced a superficially similar development. The most striking correspondence between the two, at least for an outside observer, is the presence of magic. The technology closely resembles that of Europe during the High Middle Ages and, despite the presence of things supernatural, humanity is dominant. Of greatest importance, from the perspective of the player-characters, is that there is plenty of roaming room for wandering adventurers in either world.

The divergences between the two worlds are of more immediate concern to the reader. Magic is the foremost problem in adaptation, because it works quite differently in each world and its workings are described in more than one way in the Thieves' World anthologies. The apparent absence of the non-humanoid races (such as elves) and, to a lesser extent, most of the mythological monsters from Thieves' World can cause culture shock for the visitor from the DragonQuest universe. Lastly, the rigid power and social structures do not permit ready infiltration by outsiders, let alone outworlders.

Over There

When a DragonQuest character enters Thieves' World, the following adjustments are made to his capabilities:

1. His Aspect (see 7) has no effect whatsoever.
2. An Astrologer (see 52) cannot use his skill until he has spent at least one month studying the night sky of Thieves' World. His rank with the skill is halved (round fractions down) once he gains the use of it. Prognosticative magic (such as Reading the Stars [44.5; Q-1]) will never work for a character alien to Sanctuary.
3. Any capabilities unique to the DragonQuest universe do not function in Thieves' World. For example, a Black Magician could never Call his Master (46; T-14) while in Sanctuary. The named demons with which a Greater Summoner deals can gate into Thieves' World, but see below.
4. Any wholly magical beings (such as familiars) native to the DragonQuest universe sicken within an hour of entering Thieves' World. Halve any such being's Fatigue, Endurance, and success chances for all abilities (round all fractions down). Exception: Named demons do not suffer these effects. However, the chance of summoning is quartered (round fractions down), and there is no chance the justifiably annoyed demon will grant the summoner the services of a lesser spirit. Succubi, incubi, and heroes are not affected by this rule.

5. Thieves' World is considered a mana-poor area (see 27.1) only for characters who originated in a DragonQuest world.

6. A character's Magic Resistance (see 31) does not protect him from magic cast by a magician native to Thieves' World. However, counterspells do work and Magic Resistance still functions against a magician who has also journeyed from a DragonQuest world.

These effects cease to trouble the characters once they return to the DragonQuest universe.

Believed Missing In Action

Two major aspects of Thieves' World life are not defined in these pages, because both are beyond the current scope of the DragonQuest rules. Supplementary material will eventually encompass gods and religious orders, but I can hardly presume to formulate rigid rules which recreate their effects upon DragonQuest characters in Thieves' World.

Nevertheless, it is recommended that the IIsig and Rankan gods be treated as ultrapowerful beings who can do just about anything in their respective spheres of influence—anything, that is, which does not bring them into conflict with another god. A god's influence sphere is defined as of what she or he is the god: Eshi, for example, is the goddess of love and virginity. Except in exceedingly unusual circumstances, no character can withstand a god's power without the protection of another god. (When in the bad graces of an IIsig god, supplicate to a Rankan god, and vice-versa.) Every god should be assumed to have the power of Full Geas (see 83.2).

Religion is necessarily closely tied to the gods. If the gamesmaster constructs an adventure so that the player-characters encounter priests of one or more religions, it is suggested that these priests be granted quasi-clerical abilities (as in pagan and early Catholic legend). These rely heavily on ritual—in both senses of the word—and personal magic, which is intended to directly affect an individual (the Healer skill [55] and curses [84.3 et seq.] are good examples of this). Presumably, spells which are scaled-down versions of the liege god's special powers are part of the priest's repertoire.

Dwarves, elves, halflings, giants, orcs, and shapechangers, near-humans in general, are unknown to the folk of Sanctuary. Elves and dwarves can pass for humans with strange powers, like the Raggah. Shapechangers have no difficulties unless they change to were-form, or a magician divines their true nature. Orcs can, by a stretch of the imagination, pass for hideous or degenerated humans. Giants and halflings cannot conceal their alien nature; the safest explanation is that they are wizard's get. Such a claim may not be fully believed, but will encourage a disinclination to verify the statement. The gamesmaster can have visiting near-humans become the subject of local gossip, but he shouldn't subject them to overt racial prejudice. The people of Sanctuary have long ago adopted an attitude of leaving well-enough alone unless there is a profit to be made.

The mythological monsters of the DragonQuest universe also appear to be largely unknown in Sanctuary. Creatures which can fairly be described as fabulous are found exclusively in the company of the magical fraternity or far from town. The gamesmaster, when introducing a beastie in the scenario, may assume that an analog exists for almost any monster in DragonQuest but the dragons. (Sikkintairs, for instance, are very similar to gryphons.) Just assume that the creature 'goes by a different name, has an altered appearance, and explain why a magician bothered to bring the player-characters into contact with it.

Sanctuary is currently suffering a depression. The purchasing power of silver and gold is much greater in that town than in the average DragonQuest world. Though research has failed to determine the shabooz-to-silver-penny exchange rate, the gamesmaster is advised to depress prices by no more than an order of magnitude (ten times). Fees for services rendered (such as the use of a skill) are correspondingly lowered. Pay close attention to monetary matters: regardless of what Prince Kadakithis would like to think, they are first in the hearts of the Sanctuary population.

New Characters and Story Personalities

The player who generates a character born in Thieves' World is fortunate, because he has avoided the indubitably unpleasant experience of the character's formative years. Assuming that the character is part of the great unwashed (literally and figuratively) and not the offspring of a Rankan noble or local prosperous factor, he has learned to fend for himself at a very early age and probably has undergone severe emotional trauma.

The prototypical Sanctuary personality is shot through with animal cunning and duplicity. Men have no scruples about satisfying their sexual lusts, preying on unprotected women or children depending on circumstances and tastes. Women dispassionately trade their favors for goods and services. Everyone ruthlessly contends for status. A player-character is likely to be more virtuous than this vile composite (as are most of the protagonists of the stories), but proper role-play in Sanctuary usually requires putting one's worst foot forward or sideways.

The character generation procedure is modified as follows for a Thieves' World/DragonQuest character:

1. The Perception value begins at 8 (exception to 5.4).
2. If the character's Physical Beauty is 22 or greater, he or she has been sold or shanghaied as a slave (the player has the option of generating another character) unless the character's heritage is Merchant Prince or Nobility.
3. A player does not have to successfully roll to have a character of the opposite gender.
4. A character may only be human. Near-human characters are prohibited.
5. A Thieves' World character does not have an Aspect per the DragonQuest rules. If the gamesmaster thinks he can figure out how the S'Danzo read people's futures, he can assign astrological signs accordingly.
6. Adjust the probabilities on the Social Status Table (8.1) as follows: Poor Trash 01-20, Impoverished Gentlefolk 21-35, Burgher or Farmer 36-43, Merchant 44-60, Merchant Prince 61-62, Craftsman or Adventurer 63-72, Bandit/Thief/Pirate 73-89, Lesser Nobility 90-99, and Greater Nobility 00.
7. All characters are automatically treated as bastards regardless of their actual legitimacy, unless they are born of merchant prince or noble parents. Additionally, increase the probability of a character actually being a bastard by 15% for all social classes. The chance of being a legitimate child is accordingly reduced.
8. Double the character's initial allotment of Experience Points, and divide the initial allotment of shabooz (not silver pennies) by five.
9. It is strongly suggested that male characters take the Thief skill per 8.6, and that female characters take either Thief or Courtesan (54).

10. A character who begins as an Adept has no experience points or shaboozh to start.

11. A female character may not gain Rank with a weapon which has a weight of greater than 1 pound (see 19.3) if her upbringing has been mostly confined to the civilized areas of the Rankan Empire.

12. No character born to Thieves' World may be of the College of Greater Summoning. The gamesmaster may wish to construct a College unique to Thieves' World which deals with the summoning of powerful beings, though this ability seems to be in the domain of the priesthood.

13. A character may not acquire the Astrologer skill unless he or she is full or half-S'Danzo.

14. A character begins play life at age 15. His characteristic values reflect potentials, rather than actual values. The value of each characteristic will reach its actual value by his 18th year. The gamesmaster decides the rate at which characteristic points are gained; if he does not want to leave himself open to constant argument, he should declare all point gains are strictly linear (so an Endurance point, for instance, would be realized once every 9 months). The characteristic values are initially reduced as follows:

PS -3 MD -2 EN -4 MA -2 WP -1

Agility is at full value. Physical Beauty is decreased by 3 if it is greater than 15, or increased by 1 if it is 15 or less.

The following character generation restrictions are optional. These restrictions are not in accord with the DragonQuest philosophy of starting all characters roughly equal, but do reflect the grim realities of Thieves' World life.

15. A character may not be an Adept unless his Magic Aptitude is greater than 15. Furthermore, a character has only a 30% chance of becoming an Adept. The player must assign his characteristics before he rolls to determine whether his character is an Adept.

16. An Adept begins play life at age 25, and so has reached his potential with his characteristic values (but see 18 below).

17. A Healer's Rank cannot exceed the highest Rank he has achieved with a spell or ritual not of the Colleges of Black Magics or Necromantic Conjurings. If the character is not an Adept, his Healer Rank ceiling is 1.

18. Because of the mind-set imposed on the girls of Sanctuary, female characters suffer in comparison to males. The effective characteristic values for a female are reduced by 2 for PS, EN, and MA. A female can achieve her potential in a stress situation (as did Masha) or by proper tutelage (as must have happened with Lythande). A female character who has yet to achieve her potential must pay double experience point costs for combat and all skills except Astrologer, Courtesan, Healer, and Languages. Once a woman achieves her potential, her capabilities are never again degraded because of her gender. (These handicaps are the result of indoctrination, and not of any sort of inferiority. The same effect could be recreated with boys in a female-dominated society.)

19. Every player must roll D10 at the conclusion of character generation. If the roll is 5 or less, the character suffered a grievous injury during his adolescence. Roll on the Grievous Injury Table (18.5). A character will not die except on a roll of 10, and all wounds which heal with the passage of time have done so. Other deleterious effects remain with the character. A roll of 43 (disfigurement) reduces PB by 2 in Thieves' World.

An Adept character generated in Thieves' World is, of course, constrained by the modifications to the magic system described in the next section of this text.

Each story personality of any importance is described to us from at least two perspectives, which disagree on minutiae more often than not. Poul Anderson's character with "cat-like tread" is not necessarily identical to Bob Asprin's character with "cat-like tread." Anderson's tread may indicate a character with an Agility of 21 and a Thief skill of Rank 2, while Asprin's metaphor could be a prosaic way of telling us a character has an Agility of 20. There is, obviously, no hard-and-fast conversion rate applied to personalities. I did not often have the luxury of even this confusion: Messrs. Anderson and Asprin are too proficient at their craft to constantly provide me with the same descriptions as a basis for comparison between characters.

The greater problem is, however, lack of description. The writers were not considerate enough to take us on a guided tour of each character's physical and mental potentials. We can, for instance, narrow Jamie the Red's Physical Strength to the 22-24 range, but his Willpower could be any one of a greater span of values.

Therefore, all values which link a Thieves' World personality to the DragonQuest rules are given as number ranges. (Thus Jamie's PS is given as 22-24, and his WP as 8-16.) This allows players to both second-guess my decisions and still end up with a value which is "official." For those who don't want the bother of constant reference to the books to choose one number from each range of values, simply average the high and the low values in each range. (Jamie's PS would be 23 and his WP would be 12.) This system leaves room for any new evidence about individual personalities which may come forth in the third Thieves' World volume.

Nor do the personalities all conform to the parameters given for characteristics in the character generation rules. These are not freshly-generated DragonQuest characters, but personalities who have the experience of several adventures and who operate in different living conditions. Accordingly, their characteristic values may have been modified due to any of the following circumstances.

Advancing Age. Even in a fantasy world, the elderly find that time has played havoc with their physical and mental well-being. Hakiem may be craftier than he was in the days of his youth, but he is not quite the man he once was.

Gender. The female personalities' importance in the scheme of things is reflected by the paucity of female protagonists. I do not approve of the sexist nature of Rankan society, but I still must show that Masha is not yet the equal of Cappn Varra.

Injury. Jarveena's unfortunate condition speaks for itself.

Experience. Those characters who have many accomplishments to their credit are assumed to have spent Experience Points to improve their characteristics.

Magic

Many variations on one magic theme—at least I think it is one theme—are described in the Thieves' World stories. The rules by which magic exists in Sanctuary are not the same as for the DragonQuest universe. The following modifications to the DragonQuest magic system represent a composite of the magics practiced by some of the story personalities.

1. An Adept may practice magic of more than one College. An Adept begins play knowing the magic of one College. To gain use of another College's magic within the same Alignment (34.1), he must spend 6 months of study and 5000 Experience Points; for the first College (only) of a different Alignment, he must spend 1 year in study and 7500 Experience Points. The Adept may know up to his Magic Aptitude in spells and rituals of Rank 5 or less for each College of which he has knowledge.

2. An Adept may never practice the magics of all Colleges within an Alignment, though he may practice all but one. The following pairs of Colleges are mutually exclusive: Fire and Water, Illusions and Naming Incantations.

3. An Adept must undergo a Ritual of Purification (32.2) if he wants to switch from the magic of one College to that of another without hazard. If an Adept switches without benefit of the ritual, subtract 25 from his Cast Chance (for all magic) if he switches within an Alignment, and 50 if he switches between Alignments.

4. An Adept increases his Cast Chance by 15 for each Fatigue Point he spends. The Cast Chance must equal or exceed 100 by expenditure of Fatigue Points if possible.

5. If a spell or ritual has a Cast Chance of 100 or greater, it cannot backfire. If, however, the Cast Chance is less than 100, any failure roll causes backfire.

6. A character's Magic Resistance has no effect unless he has a focus. A focus may either be a counterspell, or an object into which a counterspell has been invested (32.3; Cappen Varra's amulet is such a focus). The normal effects of a counterspell are in addition to the focus.

7. A spell is always cast per the procedure described in 33 (as amended above). A full minute is not required.

8. Cold iron does not inhibit the casting of magic for an Adept native to Thieves' World.

9. If an Adept depends on a secret for his magical powers (as does Lythande), his powers may be usurped by someone who knows his secrets:

a. The usurper must state the secret to the Adept. As long as the Adept remains in sight or sound range of the usurper, the usurper may draw on his power.

b. Upon correctly stating the Adept's secret, usurper is granted temporary knowledge of all the Adept's magical lore. (Effectively, the usurper can read the Adept's mind.)

c. The Adept cannot cast a spell or ritual as long as the usurper is using his power.

d. When the usurper casts a spell or ritual with the Adept's power, the Adept is powerless to harm him. The regular spell or ritual procedure is used, except the usurper's Magic Aptitude is figured in the calculation (not the Adept's) and any Fatigue Point loss is first taken from the Adept and, when the Adept's Fatigue is exhausted, from the usurper. Backfire results apply to both usurper and Adept.

e. A spell may not be cast using both the usurper's and the Adept's Fatigue during the same round. The usurper may choose to switch the Fatigue drain to himself if he does not think the Adept has the necessary points remaining.

f. The usurper may drain the entirety of the Adept's Fatigue Points and then cause the Adept to fall comatose until the Fatigue is restored.

g. An Adept is free to cast spells or rituals while his secret is being pronounced or when his usurper is not using his powers and the Adept has Fatigue Points remaining.

10. A character may be granted talents by a god in return for personal service. A talent is a magical ability which automatically works whenever the god specified it could be used. A talent usually only affects the character's own capabilities; he could not, for instance, injure or control another being with most talents.

A character cannot resist a god's personal magic, unless he is directly protected by another god. A god is impervious to a character's magic.

Two quasi-magical skills also are changed for Thieves' World:

11. No Astrologer may attempt to change a prediction (52.4). A full S'Danzo—not a half-S'Danzo—may attempt to divine another being's intent towards a querent or in reaction to certain events. (Moonflower determined Bourne's and Lirain's plot against the Prince and Shadowspawn.) The success chance is figured as for a regular question (52.5), but the S'Danzo is able to give a clear answer if successful.

12. A Healer may not resurrect the dead (55.7). The gamesmaster can allow the gods to bring the dead to life, though I can't imagine why a deity would bother—one human votary is as good as any other.

Personality Format

The information for all personalities is organized in the following manner:

Name. Aliases, titles, and trade names are parenthesized.

Position. A phrase describes the personality's occupation or responsibility in Sanctuary.

Appearances. Each time a personality is present in the narrative, the page reference for when we first encounter him or her is given. Passing mentions of a name are ignored. I have left the physical descriptions of the personalities to the authors and to Ace's artists, as they are the official authorities on this. TW means Thieves' World; VU indicates Tales from the Vulgar Unicorn.

Characteristics. Characteristics are given in the same order for each character. Fatigue and Action Point Allowance, which depend on the Endurance and Agility selected, respectively, must be referenced from 5.2 and 5.3. Each characteristic is presented as a range: see the explanation near the end of New Characters and Story Personalities, above.

Combat. The gamesmaster is sometimes asked to choose secondary weapons for a personality. (Rank with bare hands counts as a weapon.) Any armor and/or shield is listed.

Magic. I have taken the liberty of adding three Colleges which will appear in the first DragonQuest magic supplement (shaping magics, lesser summoning, and rune magics). If you have not acquired that supplement, ignore references to it.

Talents and Occupation. This is self-explanatory.

Skills. Again, the gamesmaster may be asked to choose secondary skills for a personality.

Comments. Any special possessions or magical conditions (such as being cursed) is mentioned. If the personality might not be in town or alive during the player-characters' adventuring, the gamesmaster is warned of this.

A “?” at the end of any ability indicates that the gamesmaster may choose to ignore that ability.

If any player takes excessive advantage of his knowledge of the books or of the information in the next section, the gamesmaster should volunteer the offending character to further the cause of science as one of Kurd's subjects.

PRINCE, RETINUE, and OFFICIALSARMAN

Hell Hound; bodyguard of Prince Kadakithis.

First Mentioned: TW 12.

PS 19-23 AG 12-18 MA 12-18

Bastard sword 7-9; other sword weapon 5-7; 2 other weapons 2-6; chainmail?

Minor magic.

Regeneration: Tempus regenerates one Endurance Point per round in combat.

When not engaged in combat, his regeneration ability depends on how Vashanka is disposed towards him. Note that Tempus can regenerate grievous injuries. Illusionary Visage: Tempus can alter his facial appearance at will.

Military scientist 3-9; Spy or Thief 3-5; 2 other skills 3-5?

Tempus' magical sword adds 20 to his Base Chance in combat, and dispells all defensive enchantments of Rank 15 or less. It glows with a pale pinkish light in the presence of enemies, especially Ilsigns.

WALEGRI

Guard soldier from Sanctuary garrison. First Mention: VU 126.

Enas Yorl is the victim of an impressive major curse which may have been augmented by magical backfire. He is a most difficult personality to play. His form randomly changes during a 24-72 hour cycle. His forms divide in roughly this fashion: 50% human male, 25% exotic human or humanoid, and 25% bizarre enough to confine him to quarters. Enas Yorl's physical capabilities are determined by his current form, but his mental and magical facilities usually remain unchanged.

DUNGEONS & DRAGONS®

Steve Marsh

D&D® (DUNGEONS & DRAGONS®) is a relatively simple system with all the ends left open for the DM to expand as he'd like, in contrast to AD&DTM, where all the ends are filled in minute detail.

Each character is the sum of his experience and life. As in most legends, each D&D® character's vitality (and the reflections of it) increases as he overcomes enemies and barriers.

In D&D® the transition to the heroic and supramundane occurs relatively soon as characters gain more hit dice, thereby allowing the players to experience the vigor and pace that permeates most of our legends.

In adapting Sanctuary, remember that the major characters (the ones detailed in this volume) are extraordinary. You could scour the Empire and not find their like. Each is heroic and worthy of note. Each has been adapted with consideration of what they actually did (not what they said they did or what they said they were) in comparison to what others around them achieved. A DM should feel free to add or subtract, or to create new classes in which to fit the characters.

When placing Sanctuary in a D&D® world, note that Sanctuary appears to be a magic-poor world with few magicians and few magic items (except for those given out by the god of war—and those bite pretty hard). It also seems to be a bit poorer than the average world, but then we see it mostly from the viewpoint of slum dwellers, and their world always is poor.

This adaptation has been done within the limits and guidelines of the two D&D® books. As everything done with those, a DM should feel that these are merely a place to start with his or her creativity, rather than a place for it to end. You may wish to read the Sanctuary anthologies differently than I did, see the uniqueness of the characters as less, and differ with me on almost every point. Yet please remember that this is a good faith effort to give a fair interpretation of the material.

Chaosium Inc. extends its thanks to TSR Hobbies, Inc. for permission to use the materials, prepared by Steve Marsh and included in this work, in a format based upon TSR's DUNGEONS & DRAGONS® Game System.

CONSTITUTION: 18

DEXTERITY: 15

CHARISMA: 11

Tempus audited the Blue Star in an effort to regain Cime and dominate the unlawful forces in himself.

When in favor with his god, Tempus is able to regenerate a point of damage every round. When not in favor, he regenerates a point of damage every day (in addition to normal healing). When he is between favor and disfavor (which often happens when the god is displeased but not truly angry) he regenerates a point of damage every hour.

Tempus carries one of the weapons of his god. Such weapons are fearsome, and often consume their bearers. They generally take one experience level plus a percentage of the experience points of the character in order to purchase them. They also reduce the percentage of earned experience (thus Cime earns only a fraction of the experience her actions would usually bring).

Tempus' weapon is a sword with edge and point. It is preternatural in its effects. Using it he does double damage (6-20 / 2D8+4) and gets double attacks. The sword reflects spells back at their casters and reverses magic bonuses (against this sword +3 armor would be -3 armor, a magic arrow would return to the person who fired it, etc.). The sword is +5 to hit. With the sword he gets (with bonuses) two attacks at +8 for 6-20 points each.

As one who was once a man and who longs for peace and love, Tempus is driven. He will aid those who he perceives could be as he was. For this reason he is in the slum of Sanctuary serving the Prince when he could be making more money in the capital. For this reason he befriends 'Snipe' (Hanse Shadowspawn). He cares for the people and tries to serve them. And he hates those who prey on others and who flout the laws and he will slay them any time and any place. The DM should play him as a hero of elemental proportions and motivations.

Alten Stulwig's wisdom score reflects his great knowledge of natural healing methods and his understanding of natural ways.

Because of this he can heal all vitamin deficiency diseases, induce miscarriages, and heal fevers—in short he has a 5 x wisdom (90%) chance of getting any result that a modern drug could achieve. He also has a few low level spells.

A DM should use Alten Stulwig as an NPC healer who will charge a "reasonable" price without asking questions. For any of his herbs he'll charge 150% of whatever the market price would otherwise be.

Enas Yorl can cast lasting polymorphs to heal deformities (at a high price). He knows many of the secrets of Sanctuary, and the past of many of its inhabitants. Part of this knowledge comes from his possession of a magic glass allowing him to view all of Sanctuary at will.

He should be played as one who already knows what the players want and why they want it. His contacts and magic usually will have shown/told him everything—or so it will appear. He will not venture forth, but can be hired to cast spells and enchant items at 150% of what the normal charge would be. Hakiem is a very bright but now-crippled thief who can no longer reach locks or second stories. Tough enough to hold his own against those who would rob him, having enough friends that no one would molest him for amusement, bright and quick enough that he learned much lore in his younger days, Hakiem now tells tales in the marketplace and begs for a living.

He is cunning and proud. He scrapes bottom for a living when times are rough (as they are now) and tells tales when people have a few copper to spare. For a price he will tell an adventurer the appropriate tale that will fill in general background knowledge or historical information. He can direct one to any place in town. In giving information or tales he will try to receive his pay first and then shortchange the payer. He will wait for his pay but, if forced to, will raise a hue and cry if not paid. He is a very useful source of information for newcomers.

In telling the past of an item, Illyra will not be able to reveal what it is, but will be able to give enough information that the players should be able to deduce what they have. With the future she will make the players aware of events that have an impact on their lives (advance warning of a draft or of a Mountain Man attack for example). This ability requires much DM discretion.

Illyra works for hire but rarely leaves her stall. She fears to be involved in the world of the magic-users of Sanctuary or the conflicts of the gods, preferring to remain in the world of her tribal magic (a type of clerical magic). She is not powerful but she is wise and knows where to find help. She has some herb lore, the chance of her being able to duplicate a modern drug being 4 x intelligence (or 60%) and her chance of having the necessary herb 2 x wisdom (or 36%). If she doesn't have the drug her chance of being able to find it is 2 x charisma (or 32%). The formulas are given in case her characteristics change.

Assuming a time before his death (or even perhaps after it if great powers stirred to raise him from the dead), the Purple Mage is deadly and powerful. He is sliding toward neutrality, caring not for the outside world except that it not bother him. At the same time his lust for power and safety draws him out into intrigues and daring. He is likely to be the connecting point for some conspiracies arising outside of Sanctuary. He is also one of the few possessing huge amounts of portable wealth and an independent paramilitary organization (the Raggah).

Adventurous, resourceful, possessing some initiative, slightly cowed by her deadingen situation, Masha is the archetype of the lower-level NPC that characters will mingle with and perhaps hire.

If post 'Spiders of the Purple Mage' she is independent and growing alive as she starts her new life. In this case the DM should treat her as someone likely to hire others in lawful pursuits and perhaps more likely to take risks as well. Add 1 level, 4 hit points, and 5% to all her skills.

For each point of wisdom, or for each level (whichever is less) a mage may maintain 1 spell (if he knows the secret and is of high enough level) via difficult enchantments. Mizraith has mastered a technique of stealing wisdom from others so that they and not he maintain the spells he continues.

Whenever Mizraith is involved in sorcerous conflict, all of the spells he maintains are subject to temporary warping and side effects. Lastel may have met his doom that way.

Like most of Sanctuary's sorcerers, Mizraith seems to be interested in sex and reputation. He judges by age and wealth. The statistics given are for Mizraith without his sons and without his spells being disturbed. If warned and aware of a life or death confrontation he would be accompanied by two of his sons equal to the statistics above and would have twice the spells himself. In that case, treat him as 14th level.

If it strikes as a weapon doing 1-8 points of damage it is +3 to hit, and so on, down to 1-12 and +1. It functions in a blur of energy. The rods reduce her earned experience by 90%. Jarveena is both a scribe and a mercenary thief for the DM. She is interested in money but has some scruples about how she obtains it. Neither murder nor torture appeal to her. She prefers not to prostitute herself but will if nothing else will work.

only one goal in mind—the slaying of the Purple Mage. Smhee will be subtle and careful, but everything he does should lead to that end. He will be careful of his means, willing to act the Neutral but not the Chaotic.

The DM should realize that Smhee has trailed the Purple Mage for over a decade and is now tougher and more prepared than he has ever been. In all that time Smhee has never been suspected nor detected by his prey. Should he choose to stalk a lesser prey he would be just as deadly and just as patient.

□ □ □ □ □ GODS and MONSTERS □ □ □ □ □

These are stats for the gods in both avatar and full manifestations. For a god's hit points, take his active worshippers and divide by 1,000. The worshippers must be active.

The usual armor class is considered to be bare skin.

ILS—has an intelligence of 19 and a wisdom of 24. Other requisites are unimportant. He would see one act into the future (his opponents all declare what they are going to do and then he gets to act first while they are forced to do what they declared). He has a 95% chance of knowing anything happening within lands where he is worshipped. His aspect would not change in different scales of manifestation.

His' knowledge of hidden weaknesses should be simulated by having the first three attacks upon him (or one he has strengthened) fail and his first three attacks do triple damage if they connect.

SHIPRI—an avatar of Shipri would have a wisdom of 21 and a charisma of 17. She would have use of all Lawful clerical spells. A full manifestation of Shipri would have the use of all clerical spells in either form and would be able to cast two per round.

ANEN—he probably would not manifest himself. If he did, his major abilities would be to cause drunkenness by touch, to raise the dead like a 12th level cleric, and to come back from the dead within three months of being slain. His full manifestation would cause drunkenness by sight and by breath (eye-to-eye contact and a 60' x 20' cone). It also would result in uncontrolled plant growth. He could use all plant control spells of magical or clerical nature.

ESHI—in avatar form Eshi would inspire lust and love for her form. Her charisma would be at maximum. In a full manifestation, Eshi would inspire lust and love for the nearest person. Her curse probably would be impotence/frigidity.

THUFIR—his avatar would be a travelling man, probably on foot. Treat him as a 12th level fighter. His full manifestation would have the strength of every road behind him. As long as he stands upon a road he would have every ability of every class. If he left a road he would act as a fighter with a lot of hit points.

THILLI—her avatar probably would be able to use all protection spells and Wall of Fire without limit. It could also kindle a small fire in almost any circumstance. Her full manifestation would have active all protection spells, and would be able to use all Wall spells (except Wall of Ice) without limit. The manifestation would turn undead as does a 14th level cleric against an individual undead—not against a group of undead beings.

SHALPA—the avatar would be a 12th level thief. A full manifestation would be both thief and fighter of the 14th level.

THEBA—an avatar of Theba would have unlimited use of first and second level clerical spells and the ability to create food and water.

A full manifestation of Theba would have unlimited use of first through fourth level clerical spells, the ability to create simple food and water, and would cause peace (like Charm but no commands) to all within 180'.

SAVANKALA—he would manifest himself as a fire elemental (just as a conjured elemental) with all fire-type magical spells, as if thrown by a 12th level magic-user. In full manifestation, he would be the size of the elemental ruler (in the world of Sanctuary he may be the elemental ruler) and has all fire/light spells as if they were cast by a 14th level magic-user, but with twice the range.

SABELLIA—her avatar temporarily would add 2 to the intelligence and wisdom of all within 200'. It could turn any clouds into rain within line of sight. Her full manifestation would have all the powers of the avatar and require magical weapons of +3 or better hit and have an armor class of -2. She is indeed distant from man regardless of her appearance.

VASHANKA—his avatar is that of a 12th level fighter. It will probably have stone giant strength and be armed with a +3 weapon with 1-3 extraordinary powers. His full manifestation is as strong as a titan and will be armed with a +5 weapon bearing 3-6 extraordinary powers. It can also use an unlimited amount of lightning bolts and can cast 1 per round when in hand-to-hand melee, 3 per round otherwise.

AZYUNA—a beautiful woman in avatar form. She is able to polymorph herself an unlimited amount of times, by only for a period of an hour each day. She usually will appear in the form of a woman that a man desires, and she will sleep with him. She will return to her proper form (a full-bodied female) as the act of intercourse gives her strength.

She does not have the ability to fully manifest herself, since she is bound to Vashanka's couch.

DYAREELA—in avatar form Dyareela would have chaotic clerical spells of fourth level and below, and would melee with fingernails like swords—each blow being like the attack of 5 swords, one attack with one hand per round. In a full manifestation, Dyareela would have all chaotic clerical spells, drain life energy like a vampire (two levels per blow) and its claws would as swords +1, an attack with each set of claws per round.

Dyareela has an alternate avatar of a 14th level magic-user (hrast ra krodi).

HEQT—in avatar form, Heqt reinforces humans. She will give them doubled chances of success and two chances to make their saving throws. She also will rechannel thwarted energy—a spell that is blocked might be rechannelled to burst a dam, or strike from behind. In full manifestation, Heqt is a giant toad. She has all clerical spells, and can bite with a titan's strength for the same damage.

THE BLUE STAR—in game terms, the Blue Star turns men into elves. They use both weapons and magic, have unlimited life spans, and become somewhat fey. Should they violate the constraints, they act only as human fighters.

THE FANTASY TRIP™

Rudy Kraft

Incorporating Thieves' World into the world of Cidri and The Fantasy Trip game system is not an impossible task but does present some difficulties. Aside from the obvious, but minor, problems (such as revising all the streets and buildings to fit a hexagonal grid) there are three major areas of difficulty.

The first involves the creation of accurate non-player character statistics. Some characters transfer with little difficulty. The characters without magical abilities, for example, are not too tough. The skills, weapons, and abilities they use in the anthologies are, for the most part, within the rules of The Fantasy Trip. One small difficulty does arise, however. The Fantasy Trip system limits the number of things a character can know how to do, based on his or her IQ. The typical Thieves' World character has many more talents than is appropriate for the IQ the character demonstrates in the anthologies. I was left with two choices. I could ignore the rules and give characters whatever talents I thought appropriate or I could grant unreasonably high IQs in order to encompass the necessary talents. I chose to do the latter. If a GM disagrees with my decision she or he should feel free to reduce the IQs to a lower level.

The wizards presented a more serious problem. Magic in The Fantasy Trip and magic in Thieves' World are not exactly the same thing (although they do bear some similarities to each other). All the magicians featured in the anthologies are far more powerful than any player characters could hope to be. They know and are able to use a large number of spells (only a few of which are even mentioned in the books). Many of these spells bear no resemblance to any normal The Fantasy Trip spells. For game purposes the GM might just as well assume that the magicians know whatever spells they happen to need. I have, however, listed those standardized spells which were used in the anthologies.

As a further point, neither Enas Yorl nor Lythande has apprentices while Mizraith does. In The Fantasy Trip apprentices with Aid spells are a necessity for powerful magicians. This does not appear to be the case in Thieves' World. For game purposes assume that Enas Yorl, Lythande, Mizraith, and the Purple Mage all have sources of (nearly unlimited) strength which are not dependent on The Fantasy Trip rules.

Another difficulty arises in the area of religion. Cidri (probably) has no gods. Being religious brings no special benefits (other than financial ones if you recruit enough followers). In Thieves' World, however, gods clearly do exist. They interact with each other and with their worshippers and they serve as a constant source of friction in the mundane world.

How a GM should deal with this is an open question. Clearly ignoring the gods completely will lose some of the flavor of the city. But the gods are hard to deal with and most mortals don't directly interact with them too often. Each GM will have to decide the issue individually.

The final problem is in incorporating the city of Sanctuary and its surrounding region into an ongoing campaign. The standard The Fantasy Trip world of Cidri is large enough to contain almost anything. There is no reason why Sanctuary and the entire Rankan Empire cannot just be placed in a previously undefined or empty section of the world. The player characters could find their way there by ship or via a well-hidden gate.

Another plausible option would have Thieves' World as an independent planet, one of 371 alternate worlds discovered by Mnoren, accessible only by gate.

The last option for incorporation would be to simply include the city of Sanctuary itself but not any of the surrounding region. This provides the GM with a partially fleshed-out environment all ready to play the next time the player-characters enter a new city.

The important thing to remember is that each GM should use Thieves' World as best suits her or his campaign. Straining the structure of a campaign to neatly fit into the confines of someone else's fantasy world is never a wise idea. Even the anthologies' authors didn't struggle to make every detail of every story entirely consistent with the works of the other authors. They settled for a general feeling of reality. So should you.

How The World's Magic Works

The world of which Sanctuary is a part allows for many forms of magic. Characters such as Enas Yorl, Lythande, the Purple Mage, and others each have their own magics, all of which work. One universal aspect of this magic, however, is that anyone in its presence is aware of it. This is a primal response, akin to the itch between the shoulder blades when an assassin has his eye on your back. It is described as a tingling sensation, and might be just the reaction of skin to a subtle electrical discharge as a by-product of magic in action. After all, magic is described elsewhere as 'awareness,' and this sensation can be considered as just one form of awareness impinging on another.

RuneQuest Rules for the Religions of Thieves' World

Unlike the cults of Glorantha, the religions of Sanctuary do not have an elaborate structure of Priests, Rune Lords, Initiates, and lay members, with benefits according to rank. In Sanctuary a Temple is made up of Priests, apprentice priests or acolytes, and the worshipping masses. For the purposes of RuneQuest, we can assume that the Priests have access to all the usual RuneQuest Rune magic, just as has been shown for Mollin Torchholder and Lythande.

But no Sanctuary religion has the equivalent to a Divine Intervention Rune spell. Instead, a Priest may, through Divination, call for the god to observe the special situation. The god then makes up its own mind as to whether or not it intervenes. As indicated in "The Dream of the Sorceress," this often takes the form of direct intervention through a personification of the god on the mortal plane.

The gods also are perfectly capable of observing for themselves and of taking action without call from their Priests. Among other things, this keeps the Priests honest.

Agents

Some gods choose agents for themselves upon the mortal plane. Tempus is an example, as is the Order of the Blue Star. This agenthood may be requested and worked for, as with the Blue Star, or descend unasked upon the recipient, as seems to be the case with Tempus. In either case, the status of agent offers advantages and disadvantages.

Advantages of agenthood normally include immortality and special powers, such as Tempus's regeneration and identity-masking abilities, or the unlimited Power and magic of the Blue Star.

Disadvantages generally take the form of geases or other constraints on behavior. Tempus must rape, not love; Lythande must hide her sex and not eat before men. Also, as in the case of Tempus, the agent seems to take on most of the temperament and attitudes of the god. The agents of the Blue Star, who worship a force, not an entity, have no such problems, and are allowed to follow their own wyrds so long as they stand ready on the final day of battle against Chaos.

Spells for the Priests of Sanctuary

Aside from the general run of Rune spells, the pantheons of Ranke and IIs, as well as the non-aligned gods, have analogs in the gods of Glorantha. Rune spells appropriate to the analog will be appropriate to the Sanctuary god.

CYCLE ONE: THE ILSIG GODS

Ils—follow those of Lankhor Mhy, with some of the leadership spells of Orlanth Rex and the deception spells of the unpublished Ermal cult.

Shipri All-Mother—Shipri's priestesses are equivalent to those of Chalana Arroy.

Anen—this god has all the plant-influencing powers of Aldrya and Gata.

Eshi—this goddess corresponds to the not-yet-published Uleria, goddess of love.

Thufir—the Issaries figure of Sanctuary.

Thuli—has no direct Gloranthan equivalent, but her Rune magic is fairly obvious, having to do with beneficial fire.

Shalpa—this god is equivalent to the Lambril thief god, soon to be published in Different Worlds Magazine.

Theba—worship resembles that of the Flesh Man of the Light-bringers pantheon.

CYCLE TWO: THE RANKAN GODS

Savankala—the sun god, similar to Yelmalio in its spells, but with full use of fire elementals. It is, in fact, far closer to the so-far-unpublished Yelm cult.

Sabellia—this goddess has some similarities to the Red Goddess, but they are faint.

Vashanka—this deity is similar to both Humakt and Humakt's opponent, Zorak Zoran. He is also a storm god, like Orlanth, with all the worse aspects of all three gods. Vashanka, more than any other, is likely to create agents tied and ribboned by geas and gift.

Azyuna—Like Eshi, Azyuna is a love goddess, though her emphasis is more on deception and adultery.

CYCLE THREE: THE OTHER GODS

Dyareela—this embodiment of evil's priests would have many appropriate spells shown in Cults of Terror.

Heqt—this renewing goddess has much in common with Eiritha and other earth goddesses of Glorantha.

Battle Magic For Thieves' World

Virtually all of the following RuneQuest descriptions of the denizens of Sanctuary show battle magic spells available to them. Readers of Thieves' World and Tales from the Vulgar Unicorn know that the regular residents do not have this normal source of Gloranthan strength—battle magic, available to any Gloranthan character who has the money, is unavailable to citizens of Sanctuary for ANY price.

However, purchasers of this Thieves' World adventure pack may want to use this material in a full RuneQuest campaign set in Glorantha. (In Chaosium's own playtesting, the city of Sanctuary became the city of Refuge, perched at the tip of a peninsula in the fabled Holy Country.) For adventures involving the people of Sanctuary, the non-player characters need at least the same spells as the adventuring RQ characters who will encounter them.

The spells chosen for the inhabitants of Sanctuary are mostly weapon- and ability-enhancing spells; the morale-affecting Demoralize is the usual attack spell. Given a little suspension of disbelief, one can assume that the characters of Sanctuary used these spells in the printed stories, but that their chroniclers felt it unnecessary to mention such commonplace details. Alternately, one may assume that battle magic in Sanctuary is a very private thing, and not likely to be mentioned or explained to some nosey roving-reporter.

No Sanctuary citizen has been given POW storage devices or crystals, or bound spirits except for the major magicians and priests. A place like Sanctuary cannot be expected to have retained many crystals, and Spirit Binding is an uncommon practice in the Rankan Empire.

With Enas Yorl, magic is a skill. Unlike most RuneQuest magicians, he does not use POW to make his spells. His POW is a catalyst causing the manipulations of the world through his spells.

The spells listed for him are fairly obvious in definition. He must make his skill roll to work the spell, and spells such as Paralyze must overcome the victim's POW. A fumble roll with a spell means that it affects him adversely. The list of spells is incomplete, dealing only with the magical effects he performs in the course of the first two books.

MAGIC ITEMS: Star tatoo is an unquenchable source of Power.

Due to her dedication to the Blue Star, Lythane has virtually any possible Rune spell available to her at any time, without needing to meditate to regain them.

Of the spells listed for the character, Time Stop is fairly obvious. It actually takes the character using it out of the flow of time to think and plan. The character cannot move quickly or interfere with anyone else without breaking the Time Stop. No RuneQuest cult has this spell.

Compulsion is a spell which puts a target under the mental domination of the caster. A successful POW vs. POW roll must be made and another must succeed for every special command given to the victim. The spell is broken if the POW vs. POW roll ever fails.

This avatar of Ihs may wander Odin-like through a crowd. Because of his power of being "The Thousand-Eyed," he has no problem finding who he wants to meet, though the actual meeting will be cryptic and brusque. If pressed to fight, he will, but rather would use his ability to transfer his POW to some object which will (1) act as a defense for another user, absorbing any magical damage up to 200 points a melee round, or (2) act offensively, doing 10D6 damage directly to the hit points of a godly being if struck. However, any damage given by the weapon subtracts the same amount of Power points permanently from the enchanted object, until all 200 points of POW are drained.

The lightning bolt has a range of 30 meters and does its damage directly to the hit points of the target: it is rarely non-fatal.

SIKKINTIARS, THE FLYING KNIVES. This dragon-like creature is known as a beast of the Ihsig god, Ihs of the Thousand Eyes. It grows to as much as thirty feet long, and is mostly tail, with a large head full of teeth, two bat-like wings, and two feet full of talons. They do not exist in the world of Sanctuary, but in an alternate dimension reachable by some priests of Ihs. Unless commanded, they will not attack humans, because humans are too small to sustain such a large creature: they prefer buffalo, bears, or elk. Some priests of Ihs know the secret of the special whistles which will command the Sikkintair.

Travellers Into Thieves' World

Traveller is a science fiction role-playing game. As such, the integration of Thieves' World into its fabric requires some work in creating a rationale for its existence. Your basic assumption must be that the world of the Rankan Empire and of Sanctuary is not a fantasy; instead it is in some way based in the same fabric that composes the Traveller universe. Putting a new world into that universe is relatively easy. Less easily does it admit the magic that pervades Thieves' World.

Thieves' World probably isn't known by that name off-planet. Its name really isn't important, since it would bear some concealing catalog number in the star charts. Its true nature would be suppressed to the universe at large.

Data culled from the anthologies defines the world and enables the construction of a Universal Planetary Profile (UPP) to describe it.

World N-68956 0405 X866670-1 Agricultural World.
Interdicted. RG.

This UPP deciphers into the following characteristics. Thieves' World is located in subsector hex 0405, just about in the middle of the region. There is no starport—if there is one, it is well-concealed and not general knowledge, on- or off-world. It is a large world, about 13,000 km (8,000 miles) in diameter, with a gravity similar to that of Terra. It has a standard atmosphere also similar to that of Terra. Perhaps 60% of the world is water. The population of Thieves' World is estimated at 10^6 persons, perhaps several million all told. There is no world government (although the Rankan Empire appears to be pre-eminent at the moment); thus government is categorized as balkanized, indicating a plethora of rival nation-states. Consistent with the lawlessness of Sanctuary, and with the emphasis on individual initiative, the world's law level is zero.

The technological level for the world is rated at 1, probably equivalent to Terra's early Middle Ages. Overall, the planet's characteristics (especially its hydrographic percentage and its pleasant atmosphere) earn it the rating Agricultural World. The presence of magic in whatever its form has prompted the Third Imperium to interdict it with a Red travel zone rating; whether this is to keep wayfarers from interfering with the world, or to keep thieves on-planet remains to be seen. The star system that holds Thieves' World also contains at least one gas giant (like Jupiter or Saturn) to aid in refuelling starships arriving and departing.

Rationales

There are three rationales for the existence of Thieves' World. The referee running the particular Traveller campaign must select one, and then use it as the reason behind the Thieves' World adventures he or she administers.

The first rationale is perhaps the simplest: it accepts magic as real and powerful, although confined to the surface of this particular world. The precise reason that magic works is unclear, but may be a result of some local conditions. To the scientifically-minded, the source and reason for magic may well be the cause for many Traveller adventures.

The second rationale carries the first one step farther and refines it. Magic works, but in the sense of Clarke's Law: any sufficiently advanced technology is perceived as magic by lower technologies. Once upon a time, Thieves' World held a very high technological society (level 20 perhaps), and even today, artifacts and remnants of that high tech level remain, known to locals as magic items. The subtle semi-electrical discharge of magic in action betrays the function of these high tech level items.

The third rationale goes farthest afield. Thieves' World is truly a far-fetched fantasy. It has no real existence in terms of a world or of a planet. Instead Thieves' World is the figment of a vast, high-powered computer's imagination—a gigantic role-playing game for real people. On Trin, in the Trin's Veil subsector, in the Spinward Marches of the Imperium, ISMM Corporation maintains a computer software laboratory dedicated to the advancement of the computer sciences. To this end, the Thieves' World simulation is available (for a price) to travellers who find out about it and then make the right contacts. For a price (about Cr10,000 per person) a band of adventurers can step into specially-constructed "experience tanks" and spend about two weeks (both real and experienced time), with options for additional two-week extensions, provided money has been left on deposit for this purpose. Within this computer-moderated game, absolute parallels with the Thieves' World anthologies are possible. Money and material objects cannot be removed from the simulation, but knowledge, experience, and self-confidence can. Best of all, death is not real, merely an awakening back into the Traveller universe.

Character Generation

Traveller characters taken to Thieves' World retain all of their normal characteristics and skills, including psionics, if the character has been tested and trained. Traveller characters generated on Thieves' World should be one of the following types (taken from Traveller Supplement 4, Citizens of the Imperium): Pirates, Sailors, Doctors, Diplomats, Barbarians, Rogues, Nobles, or Hunters. When a locally inappropriate skill is received, care must be taken to forego it and to try again. Gun weapons are not available locally; bow skills only rarely are received. The education characteristic throw for any character should have a DM of -6, to reflect the poor educational facilities and opportunities available locally.

In place of vehicle skills which might otherwise be received, characters may gain one of the three following skills: Teamster, Swimming, and Equestrian. Teamster allows an individual to handle animal-driven carts or wagons. Swimming allows an individual to travel in water with some ability, and shows an acquaintance with water activity. Equestrian allows an individual to ride animals such as horses (possibly camels, donkeys, and so on).

Magic

Traveller, because it is a science fiction role-playing game, makes no provision for magic in the traditional fantasy role-playing sense. Some characters rated for use with Traveller have been given a skill called Magic, which reflects the degree of training and expertise that the person has in the magic arts. Receipt of this skill depends on training from an already accomplished mage or sorcerer, generally at the rate of one level of skill per two or three years spent with the mage. The level of magic skill is an indication of relative strength of magicians.

Prince Kitty-Cat

If the Traveller referee desires a detailed magic presence in Thieves' World adventures, then a magic system must be decided on, and then grafted into the game system. The specific system used must depend on the preferences of the referee.

In addition to any magic, which on Thieves' World betrays itself with a tingling semi-electrical discharge, Traveller also admits psionics. Psionic abilities do not betray themselves as do magical abilities: psionic activity is totally undetectable (unless their effects are audible or visible, or the victim/recipient also has psionic talent).

TUNNELS & TROLLSTM

Ken St. Andre

Robert Asprin's Thieves' World is quite unlike the fantasy world of the regular Tunnels & Trolls game as explained in the T&T rules. For one thing it is simply a human world. There are no elves, dwarves, hobbits, orcs, trolls, or mythical monsters such as dragons running around at large. (If any of the mythical beasties do exist, they stay well out in the badlands away from human civilization.) For another thing, the gods are real and in constant conflict with each other. This means that the T&T player will have to adjust his/her viewpoint a bit before attempting to use Sanctuary as a T&T adventure setting.

Which isn't to say that this is a bad thing: when all the player-characters (and non-player-characters) are mere humans, their relations tend to be more natural and realistic.

T&T players don't realize how good they have it compared to other worlds of fantasy. We swagger around with our magic weapons, magic armor, and thousands of gold pieces. If poverty threatens, we just pop into a nearby tunnel complex, or sign up for a few fights in the Arena of Khazan, and bingo! we're either flush or dead in no time. In the Rankan Empire, of which Sanctuary is a far-flung outpost, they don't do things that way. The medium of exchange is the lowly copper piece, not the lordly gold. The only dungeons around are those belonging to Prince Kadakithis, Governor of the city. There are plenty of magicians, but no one common framework for their magic. Some of them like the S'Danzo seem to operate with psi powers—good enough for fortune-telling and little else. Others have the favor of a deity, and their magic stems directly from the deity's power. Still others seem more like the traditional alchemists of medieval Europe. And I can't even try to explain the Secret-granted powers of the Adepts of the Blue Star.

For a good understanding of Sanctuary and the non-player characters I will describe after this essay, one should read the books. Most of the finer writers in science fiction and fantasy today are included in these anthologies. I can only say that the city is a grim place, and that many of the most interesting characters live on the wrong side of the law. Sanctuary is a place of low intrigue, wanton brutality, and sudden death. Many of the more memorable events in the city's history are set off by the direct intervention of the gods—such as the weapon shop of Vashanka that suddenly appeared handing out magic weapons free for the taking to all those who wanted them. If you are a sweetness-and-light person you won't find yourself at home in Sanctuary.

Sanctuary is the collective creation of several writers, none of whom plays T&T to my knowledge, and as a consequence the magic used in Sanctuary bears little resemblance to T&T magic. Some of the T&T spells, such as the illusion-creating spells, are in common use. Others such as Fly Me (for instant levitation) seem unheard of. The gamer has two choices. Either use magic very sparingly in Sanctuary-based adventures, or else use it with reckless abandon according to the T&T rules and ignore discrepancies between your play and the way the stories read. Personally, I would allow all T&T magic, but limit anyone below 10th level to knowledge of 1 spell per level. Wizards above the 10th level in Sanctuary apparently can do almost anything they want unless they have to cope with another high-ranking wizard. At any rate, none of the spells employed in Thieves' World are likely to be known by their T&T name—that is if spells there have names at all instead of just descriptions. Things tend to be called an "Illusion" spell or a "fear" spell, etc.

For accurate description I have introduced a character type not found in the 5th edition T&T rules, though its existence is implied throughout. This character is definitely not a Wizard, Warrior, Rogue, or Warrior-Wizard, definitely not a Thief, Cleric, Paladin, or Barbarian (character types in non-T&T systems. When you call the character a Normal you have said it all. This is your average citizen and definitely not an adventurer. Probably the great mass of city inhabitants fall into this category, but since they are generally boring, only a few will be described.

The character statistics following will give familiar reference to the Thieves' World stories. Such men as Zalbar the Hell Hound, Prince Kitty-cat, and Jubal the Information Merchant could not fail to leave their mark on the environment. Feel free to use them in your scenarios. Better yet, invent some memorable city dwellers of your own to add more detail and life to your creation. When you play a really terrific story, you might consider writing it up as a story and sending it to Asprin. The odds are very, very long, but who knows—if you're good enough, perhaps your characters and story will appear in a future Thieves' World anthology. Good luck and good gaming!

He also carries 2 throwing knives, one hidden in his boot, and the other concealed somewhere in his clothing.

□□□□□ MONSTERS □□□□□

Sikkintairs

The sikkintair is a mythical beast in the pantheon of Ils, chief god of the conquered Ilsig state. It is a kind of bat-winged flying dragon with claws and teeth the size of knives and a long serpentine neck. From mouth to tail it would be about 30 feet long. They actually live in an alternate world that the priests of Ils can reach at will. Although the "flying knife" is one of the most horrible monsters the people of Sanctuary can envision, it is not really that tough in T&T terms. It can be slain by a mortal man, if that man is good enough. Jamie the Red and Tempus undoubtedly could do it (in fact, Jamie did it). It will get 31 dice + 150 adds in combat. As its monster rating is reduced, its combat adds will shrink also, always remaining one-half of its monster rating. Although one sikkintair is normally enough to handle any situation, they will fight in packs of up to 6 creatures if need be.

Combat Bears

The Purple Mage kept a couple of large white bears as part of his contingent of guards. Everyone knows what a bear is. In Sanctuary they would seem to have a monster rating of 50 apiece, getting 6 dice + 25 combat adds each.

Purple Spiders

Also guardians of the Purple Mage, these obnoxious little creatures have a monster rating of 1 each, but also have the most deadly venom known in Thieves' World. If a character is bitten by one, he must make a 10th level saving roll on CON to avoid dying in agony (65-CON).

HAS MET

To ensure continuity of the personalities of the various leaders and people of prominence in Sanctuary, referees are offered the Personalities Record Form. It can be used to record the personality and notes about non-player characters (NPCs) likely to be met by player-characters. Game masters can maintain consistent characters by using this sheet for their NPCs. There is room for the initial character and for additional information generated during the course of play.

The top left section contains basic ID information. The entries should be self-evident; if some seem inappropriate, ignore them. The listing "Master Of" can record the skills which the character knows: this is useful for promising to train or to impress someone, or to otherwise inform them (barbarians like to boast, such as "I am master of spear and sword!"). The "Total Stats Found At" notation should be followed by the page number of the full character stats for the game master's system.

The top right section contains the outward appearance of the character. Again, some entries may be inappropriate—do not feel compelled to fill in blanks just because the blanks exist. "Synopsis" refers to a short description of the overall appearance of the character. This might describe the character physically or be a projection of the personality, such as handsome, beautiful, plain, ugly, hideous, skinny, noble, slovenly, dynamic, heroic, effeminate, masculine, fat, crude, and so on.

The "Personality Factors" section in the lower right corner of the sheet supplies the referee with an outline of how the character reacts in a gamut of situations. To use the section, divide the range present by D100 into three portions, each portion referring to the proportion of the character's probable reaction concerning a style of personal existence. For instance, Jamie the Red is normally brave, rarely weighs the balance between bravery and cowardice, and almost never is cowardly. Thus his percentages on the 'Bravery/Cowardice' axis might look like this: 01-85 / 86-99 / 00. When the game master needs to establish Jamie's reaction, he merely rolls D100. The middle range can either be a hesitation on Jamie's part or can give the game master leeway in choosing the reaction he prefers.

The list summarizes a character's personality. Watch for any unusually wide range of a particular reaction. Someone with a 0-90 result at the 'Nervous' end of the scale will usually appear VERY nervous; the same rating on the 'Energetic/Lazy' axis would indicate somebody who constantly works, talks, moves, and rarely takes a day off.

"Interests" should be noted with checks in appropriate boxes. Game masters should remember that people have limited time to devote to cultural interests. Most NPCs in the Adventure Pack will have 1D6 special interests, normally complementing their occupations in some way.

The "Attitudes" section allows quick reference for how the character feels about a variety of subjects and people. Use this section cautiously and in conjunction with "Personality Factors." The blank spots should be filled in with a single appropriate word, like panicky, fearful, subservient, dutiful, loving, adoring, affectionate, respectful, fearful, formal, courteous, rude, distrustful, hateful, hostile, cruel, stingy, protective, and so on.

The small "Has Met" section in the lower right allows the game master to keep track of which player-characters the NPC has met. Further information, such as dates, details of interactions, whether friends or enemies, etc., can be kept on the back of the form. This is especially important if more than one game master uses the book. Keeping track of such events draws together the warp and woof of the fantasy world to make a satisfying game fabric.

SCENARIO IDEAS

These ideas are presented to pique the gamemaster's imagination, and are not to be slavishly followed. They could not be, for none of the situations provide all the details needed for play. But they may well help out the gamemaster jotting down justifications, reasons, rationales, and schemes.

Remember that the gamemaster can try out any point of view intimated by the particular scenario suggestion. In the first suggestion, for instance, the point of view is from the Silk Merchant who wants a job done. But if the gamemaster needed an NPC thief to run across the path of the players some night, he could choose to put the thief on this particular job, either during or before the snatch.

INTERLOCKING SCENARIOS

[Greg Stafford]

1. The Rivals

Hessel, the Silk Merchant, wants some competent thieves for a job. He will first send his servant, Timayis, a nervous fellow, to the Vulgar Unicorn to hire someone. The servant has little confidence in his ability to pick out competent thieves. Thus this first job is a test to see if the individuals chosen are or are not competent.

Hessel wants a list stolen from the home of Nichols, another silk merchant. Hessel figures that he can increase his business by stealing the customer list of his rival and then undercutting Nichols' prices in one swift maneuver.

Hessel wants the theft to be untraceable to him, and will pay on delivery. He does not want the merchant or his family killed.

If the theft is a success, then Hessel will offer to hire the thieves for a bigger job if they want it. The new job pays five times as much, and the merchant will tell no more until the thieves swear to secrecy. The details are in suggestion Two, just below.

2. The Military Rival

Hessel the Silk Merchant is enraged at a prostitute whom he frequented, and to whom he gave many fine presents. She has left her place in the (gamemaster's choice) brothel to wed a foolish young soldier who refuses, at the point of his sword, to allow old Hessel close to the girl.

Hessel wants the soldier killed, figuring that the woman will return to the whorehouse and thereby come once more within range of Hessel's affections. He wants no clues that he arranged the murder, for which he will pay quite well. If he trusts the robbers, he will pay in advance. His trust only can be earned by performing the previous scenario.

WELCOME TO SANCTUARY

[Lynn Willis]

3. The Traffic Citation

If the characters are riding their horses into Sanctuary, they unwittingly will go up a street in which no horses are allowed between mid-morning and dusk.

A member of the watch will notice this, and instruct the adventurers to follow him. If they attempt to bribe him, he will angrily refuse and demand that they follow. If they ignore the little fellow (he is short, and not too well armed), then he will blow his coach horn and 2 Hell Hounds and 1D10 watchmen will appear at the open end of what will prove to be a dead-end street. If the adventurers fight their way out, they will be marked criminals. If they accompany the watchman to see his Captain, they will be admonished and/or fined, depending upon the degree of their resistance or humility. The adventurers now will be known to the authorities, who may take a daily or weekly interest in them, as may Jubal.

It is possible to break a vase, step on turnips, ignore a direct instruction from a watchman, etc., and get the same result.

4. Docking The Ship

Approaching Sanctuary from the sea, the adventurers must decide whether to anchor in the roadstead or to tie up at one of the piers. If they dock without permission, an officious person will bustle down and declare that they've tied up illegally, and that either they must remove their vessel or that they must pay a landing fee and open their ship for customs inspection. The landing fee is 1D6 silver coins per 3 meters or 3 yards of the ship's length. The captain must immediately state the purpose and length of stay of his ship, and crew and passengers must be identified.

If the adventurers bribe the official, his price will be half of the legal entry/docking fee, but the official will insist on inspecting the ship and cargo completely, so that he knows what risk he runs. If there is anything of value, thugs equal to the number of the crew will visit the ship that night and try to steal everything they can carry.

If the adventurers want to sell anything or need to trade or to transfer cargo, then Jubal's representative will call and request a 10% trade protection insurance fee. If the adventurers pay it, then any thugs hired by the official will not appear. If the adventurers take on cargo only, or do no selling or trading, Jubal's man will not appear.

If the adventurers originally anchor in the harbor and row ashore, politely asking permission and instruction, a customs agent will make a brief appearance, charge them 5 silvers, and be gone without complication.

5. In The Desert

Caravanning to Sanctuary, the adventurers come across an old man sitting under an awning in the midst of nowhere. He reclines under an awning; around him are scattered piles of goods—bolts of silk, inlaid boxes, and more well-made luxuries of some value.

If the adventurers stop when he waves and calls, he will tell them that another caravan left him here because he attempted a small indiscretion with a daughter of the caravan leader. He will beg to sell the adventurers what of his goods he might, for he knows they will be stolen if he leaves for Sanctuary for pack animals to transport the valuables.

The players can see he has a shifty face, but he is actually more shifty yet, for the goods in truth were smuggled in from the coast to make a backlands entry into the city—as though they came from Ranke overland. Unfortunately, some 'most vicious' Hell Hound disrupted the scheme, slew his beasts, and forbade the smuggler the streets of Sanctuary upon pain of death, and his life Reeble holds dear.

Occasional desert-dwellers come by and steal portions of his cargo while he is asleep or drunk, but he has enough magic and skill to make all but the strongest wish not to transgress. Now he bends all his wiles and whines to ensnare the first gullible suckers he has seen, and maybe make a profit after all from his scheme.

The Hell Hound marked and sealed the goods, to discourage entry into the city, but Reeble will tell the adventurers that the seals and signs ensure quality of merchandise. If they do not read Rankan, they may believe him.

The cost to him of the goods was 300 silvers; their fair market value in Sanctuary is 3000 silvers. In Ranke they would be worth 1200 silvers. The old man tearfully will take 500 as his rock-bottom price, but the negotiations will open at 4500. He will beg, expose his age and infirmities, pray to his wife, endlessly flatter the adventurers, insinuate magical qualities about the goods, and even threaten them with curses from the gods should they help ruin an old, old man.

If the adventurers try to rob Reeble, they will have run into a tiger. He has on armor under his robes (that's why he won't come out of the shade) and has the stats for a Hell Hound, with access to five spells of the GM's choice.

If the adventurers bring the goods to Sanctuary, the gate watch will see a PROSCRIBED GOODS sign scratched on one item, and it will take 300 silvers for him to allow them into the city. He will report the adventurers as suspicious characters, and the watch will visit them that evening. The bribed watchman will be along, explaining that he let the adventurers enter only because he feared for his life from such strong and ruthless characters. The trial that follows (if they don't fight their way out) will strip the party of their money and most of their weapons and armor.

SELL-SWORDS [Steve Perrin]

6. The Raid on the Apothecary

Alten Stulwig has received word that Jubal is going to raid his shop to obtain all of his supply of a particular herb (which one he doesn't know).

- a. Characters may be hired by Alten to guard the shop and greenhouse.
- b. Characters may be hired into Jubal's Hawkmask to obtain the apothecary's total supply of Dalin, so as to blackmail the Prince into stopping his efforts against Jubal's operations.

7. The Escalating Guard Effect

Damron the Tanner is hiring guards to keep the kids from stealing stuff out of his courtyard.

- a. Characters may be hired as guards.
- b. Characters hear a rumor that the tanner has found a hoard of gold that he is holding in his shop so that his wife, Nora, won't find out about it (GM's discretion as to whether this is true.) Surely the tanner would not hire armed guards to simply protect his vats

8. The Interrupted Assignment

The Prince's wife is meeting a Duke of Caronne who is visiting incognito. They have ducked into Zoplay's Laundry because they think they are being followed.

- a. Characters have been hired by Molin Torchholder to follow the Prince's wife because he suspects her infidelity.

- b. Characters have been contacted by Cappen Varra to guard the Duke, and recognize him entering the laundry with seeming footpads in hot pursuit.

9. The Compromising Scroll

Melilot has a scroll compromising Nichols the silk merchant, for an ancient indiscretion, unknown to his wife. Hessel the silk merchant wants the information to use against his rival.

- a. Characters are hired by Melilot to guard his premises.
- b. Character is hired by Hessel to get the information so he won't have to pay Melilot for it.
- c. Nichols hires character(s) as representative in his dealings with Melilot.

10. Shady Employment

Jubal is looking for more Hawkmask. Tempus' depredations have reduced the number of the Hawkmask alarmingly, and this loss must be made up. The crime lord's agents are careless about who they hire, for Jubal has a weeding-out plan.

A smuggler is coming to a rarely-used landing on the shore of the Swamp of Night Secrets. If the location is compromised, it will mean nothing to Jubal's regular activities. All of the new recruits, with a couple of replaceable veterans, will escort the smuggler as his crew brings the cargo to a rendezvous with Jubal. If all goes properly, well and good. If not it will be no great loss and Jubal may have a good idea of who betrayed the mission.

- a. Characters may hire on as Hawkmask and guard the cargo.
- b. Characters may be hired by the Hell Hounds to infiltrate the new hires and betray the landing.
- c. Characters may be temporarily drafted into the watch to join in a raid on the landing, which has been betrayed by someone else hired as in b., above.
- d. Characters exploring the swamp on their own (say as prospectors for a site for their own smuggling operation) may stumble into the middle of the brawl.

Time & Strategy

Eric Goldberg

The gamesmaster, when planning an adventure for the characters, faces two crucial questions: at what point in time does such an adventure occur and can the characters interfere with the events of the stories?

The values and abilities for the personalities usually have been figured for when the reader is first introduced to them. Only those who die and those who realize their potentials during an exceptional adventure—such as Masha—will be changed significantly in this respect at the end of the second anthology.

If the events of the books cannot be interfered with, every time the characters take an action which would change the course of events, they either begin to fade or are shunted to another reality. Characters who fade become progressively "unreal," until they no longer have any substance in Thieves' World. Faded characters are ghosts in time, who can only affect other such ghosts. Characters shunted to another reality are essentially playing the adventure as if they can interfere freely with the plots of the stories. However, the gamesmaster may inflict penalties upon them for causing probability stresses upon adjoining realities.

But for those who do not wish to indulge in time or alternate universe paradoxes (which should include most readers), the gamesmaster must either allow the player characters to affect the outcome of the stories, or better yet, start the adventures after the conclusion of the second volume. The latter solution will work until Ace releases the third volume.

The player-characters must carve niches for themselves in the Sanctuary hierarchy. Here the standard fantasy party sharply diverges from the stories: the protagonists operate solo or in pairs, whereas the party is often a marauding band on the order of a detachment of Jubal's hawkmask.

If the player-characters do indeed prey as group upon the underworld, they must expect retribution from Jubal, who will quite correctly view them as a threat to his hegemony in that sector of the population. If need be, Jubal will hire magical assistance, and it will be good. If the player-characters are not circumspect about their hell-raising activities, the Hell Hounds and other municipal authorities may make it their civic duty to incarcerate or kill them. And, of course, too many magical fireworks will bring the characters into conflict with magicians, priests, and gods, and not necessarily in that order.

Survival and success in Sanctuary is a matter of adaptation. The town will break the uncompromising player-character as surely as the sun will rise tomorrow (on Earth—we can't be too sure about Thieves' World). The intruder must inveigle his way into the good graces of the powers-that-be, establish a reputation for himself, and covertly build a power base. Only then can he dare flaunt his might in public.

It's easy to recognize the player character who makes it in Sanctuary. He's as treacherous and as dangerous as any of the protagonists in the stories.

DAVE ARNESON was born in Minnesota in 1947. After graduating from the University of Minnesota, he held numerous jobs while continuing his many gaming and game mastering projects. His first published game was Don't Give Up The Ship. His best-known contribution to FRP is the original work and inspiration for D&D®. Since then various companies have published his designs such as The First Fantasy Campaign and his current FRP system, Adventures in Fantasy. He is now head of his own game company, Adventure Games Inc., and presently is developing computer games of strategy and adventure.

ERIC GOLDBERG began designing games four years ago for SPI. Aside from DragonQuest, his more noted designs are Commando (which won the H.G. Wells award for the best role-playing game of 1979), Kursk (a simulation of the WWII battle), and War of the Ring (from the Tolkien trilogy). Current projects include an FRP game for Avalon Hill and a WWII west-front game. He writes game reviews regularly for some of the wider-circulation gaming magazines. He currently nurses passions for baseball, astronomy, and a redhead, and lives in New York City.

RUDY KRAFT is 23 years old, and has been playing adventure games for 13 of those years. He was introduced to FRP at Cornell University. Since his graduation he has made a living as a designer of role-playing adventures and supplements, including Snake Pipe Hollow, Duck Tower, and the recently-released Griffin Mountain. He edits Baron Publishing's science fiction and fantasy gaming magazine, Gryphon.

WES IVES has been in the adventure/wargaming hobby since 1967, when he appropriated the family fallout shelter as a place in which to leave Blitzkrieg set up safe from well-meaning family members and curious pets. He currently lives, as he has most of his life, in North Carolina, where he is a technical writer by day and a gamer by the light of the moon. His credits include FGU's Saurians supplement to C&S.®

STEVE MARSH was one of the first gamers to see D&D® when it first was being formulated in 1973. From that time he has actively participated in its development and of its successor, AD&D™. He continues cordial relations with TSR Hobbies, Inc., and is also working with Chaosium on its upcoming HeroQuest rules. E. Gary Gygax writes of Steve,

"...his contributions still form a valuable part of what we do at TSR. In fact, I hope that within the not-too-distant future a number of modules authored by Steve Marsh and Gary Gygax will be appearing. Steve's work on the 'other planes of existence' is most stimulating, just as you will find his work herein to be. TSR is very fortunate to have had Steve as both an enthusiast and as a contributor to our work, just as I have been fortunate in having him as a friend and fellow fantasy game enthusiast."

MARC MILLER is an award-winning game designer and author. In addition to Traveller and more than a dozen adventures and supplements, he also has designed over twenty historical and science fiction board-games. He has published articles in every major gaming magazine in the hobby.

MARY BETH MILLER is Extra-Mural Librarian at the University of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana campus. Already an award-winning poet, this is her first work in gaming.

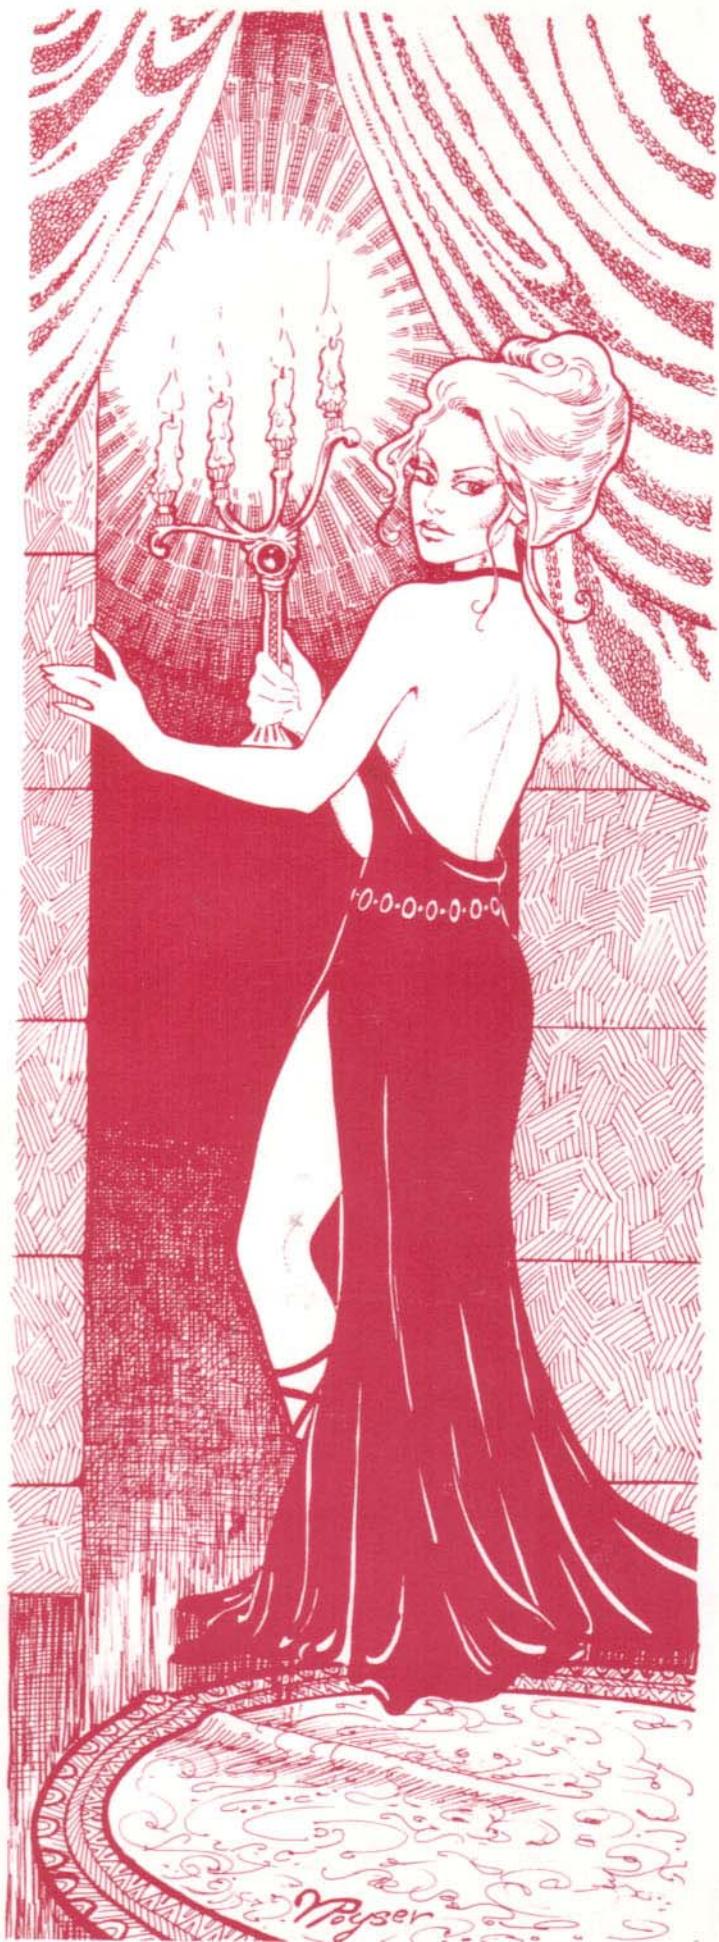

STEVE PERRIN first was drawn into wargames by the AH classics, Tactics II and D-Day. He battles from boardgames to life-scale wargames (courtesy of the Society for Creative Anachronism) until he settled on fantasy role-playing, first with the Perrin Conventions, then with the All The Worlds' Monsters series (with Jeff Pumper) and finally with the award-winning RuneQuest game system, coauthored by Ray Turney, Steve Henderson, and Warren James. He now works full time with Chaosium, taking occasional time off to see his talented artist-wife, Luise Perenne.

LAWRENCE SCHICK was born and raised around Akron, Ohio. He played all sorts of games since early childhood, and started on wargames in the mid-'60's with Avalon Hill. Schick attended Kent State and there discovered role-playing games. TSR Hobbies hired him in early 1970, and in 1980 he became head of all game design and production for that company. This left him little time to design games, however, so in early 1981 he left the management position to become Senior Designer for TSR.

RICHARD SNIDER is 27 years old, and a long-time Minnesota resident. He is studying archaeology at Mankato State College in Mankato, Minnesota. He is the co-author of Adventures in Fantasy, and designed Quest for Heritage Models. His most recent project is Mutants, upcoming from Adventure Games Inc.

KEN ST. ANDRE was born in Arizona approximately 34 years ago. He invented his first game at age 6, using the components from a Monopoly set. His primary fame in the hobby comes from his invention of Tunnels & Trolls™ in 1973. His most recent major contribution to role-playing is Stormbringer, a role-playing game the mechanics of which were adapted from Basic Role-Playing, recreating in gaming terms the Elric stories by Michael Moorcock. He currently lives with wife and daughter in subtropical Phoenix, Arizona.

THE MAZE

"Only those who seek Death or sell It enter the Maze"

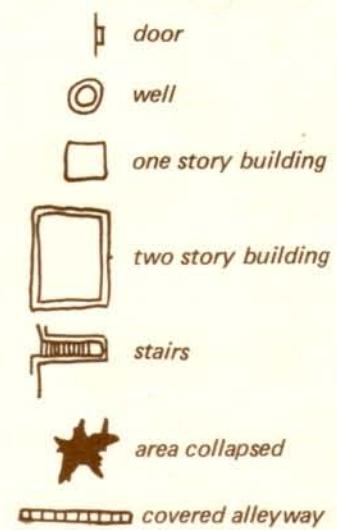

One-story buildings are shacks that lean against two-story structures. A one-story building is outlined by a single line.

Two-story buildings are outlined by a double-line. Two-story buildings without external stairs have stairs or trap doors between the floors. Such buildings are usually better kept-up, and lived in by single families. Two-story buildings with external stairs are probably tenements.

ROBERT L. ASPRIN'S thieves' world

Designed for Use with 9 Role-Playing Systems

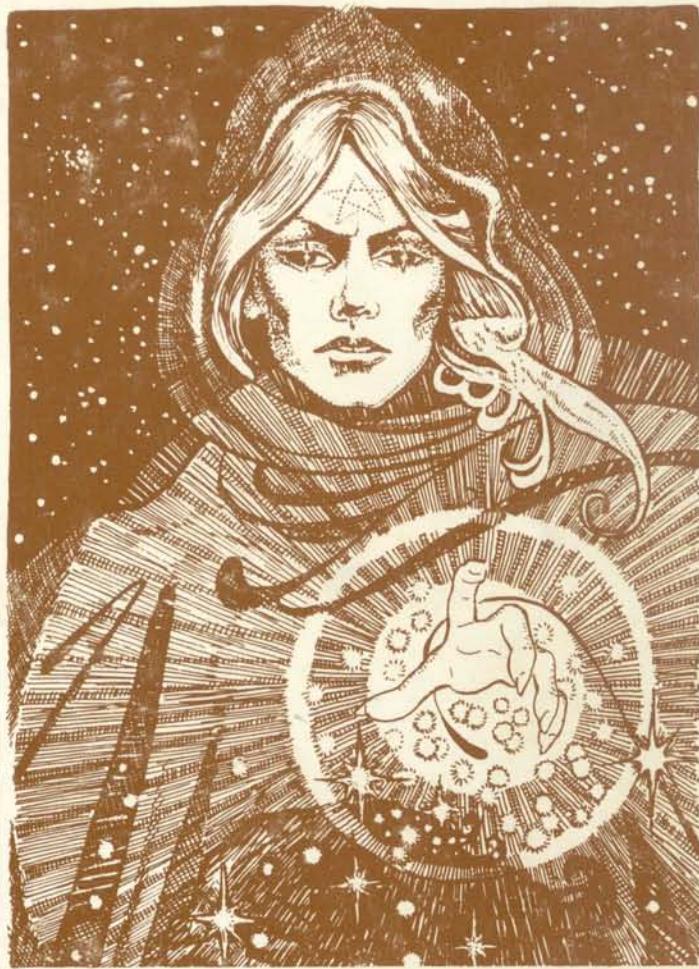

The new material in this adventure pack makes it a must for Thieves' World fans.
—Robert L. Asprin

Skulk through the night on the heels of Shadowspawn . . . delve into the twisted tunnels of the Purple Mage . . . attend the court (or perhaps the harem) of Prince Kadakithis . . . dodge the keen-eyed Hell Hounds with Jubal's Hawk-masks . . . drink your ale and guard your purse at the Vulgar Unicorn . . . boldly walk the streets of the wildest, most varied, and most downright fascinating city in fantasy literature—SANCTUARY, the Thieves' World!

The Adventure Pack Includes

The Players' Guide to Sanctuary — the creation of Sanctuary; Thud and Blunder; Sanctuary chronology; 'Hakiem' and 'The Hell Hounds'; a stroll through the city; a captured Ilsigi document; magic, working ladies, and oaths; glossary/pronunciation guide; a map of the known world; a city map. The Game Master's Guide to Sanctuary — palm-greasing and arrest procedures; a secret Carronnian report; city gods and religions; main city encounters; encounters for the Jewelers' Quarter, Processional, and Westside; 18 tables of specific encounters; descriptions/encounters for The Maze, Bazaar, Street of Red Lanterns, Downwind; business generators and tables by area; 6 area maps, 15 floorplans of typical buildings (including the Vulgar Unicorn); scenario suggestions. The Personalities of Sanctuary — story/character index; system notes as applicable and character stats for 9 RPG systems (minimum of twenty characters each, each system divided to Prince and Retinue, Transients, and Residents); general descriptions of other characters. Wall Map of Sanctuary. Referee Maps of The Maze, The Maze underground.

Role-Playing At The Summit

Readers hailed the appearance of Thieves' World as an exciting innovation in fantasy writing. Author/editor Asprin's shared setting allows fantasy writers to swap characters and events while gleefully spinning tales about Sanctuary, the city where the alleys are dark and the future is dim. Writers participating in the first two volumes are Lynn Abbey, Poul Anderson, Robert Asprin, Marion Zimmer Bradley, John Brunner, Christine DeWees, David Drake, Philip Jose Farmer, Joe Haldeman, Janet Morris, Andrew Offutt, and A.E. van Vogt.

Now this adventure pack recreates the group participation and cooperation of the books, bringing together the broadest possible galaxy of designers and systems to translate the city and characters into FRP terms. The project attracted some of the brightest names in gaming: Dave Arneson (D&D® Adventures in Fantasy), Eric Goldberg (DragonQuest, Kursk, etc.), Rudy Kraft (ed., Gryphon Magazine), Wes Ives (Saurians), Steve Marsh (D&D®, AD&D™ contrib.), Midkemia Press (Cities, Karse), Marc W. Miller (Traveller™, Imperium, etc.), Steve Perrin (RuneQuest, founding member SCA), Lawrence Schick (Senior Designer, TSR Hobbies), and Ken St. Andre (Tunnels & Trolls™, Stormbringer).

Chaosium gratefully thanks the people and companies who have graciously authorized this use of their role-playing systems and who have worked so diligently and harmoniously to produce this adventure pack.
